However, with an apologetic smile toward Madam Jin, Jiang Yanli walked into the center of the conflict, standing in front of Wei Wuxian.

"A-Li, what are you doing?" Madam Yu demanded. "Why do you always go blank in the head when that brat is involved!"

Jiang Yanli tensed slightly at the anger being directed her way, but then, glancing over at her other self — a woman who could stand tall even before some of the most powerful people in the world — stopped. She paused for a moment, then turned back to look her mother in the eyes.

"I'm sorry, A-Niang," she said. "But I…"

She thought back to the accusations being thrown Wei Wuxian's way and the dirt smearing his name. She considered the unfair standards people held him to, and constant, never ending use of his parents' positions against him.

And how blackened his name was, thirteen years later.

She looked directly at her mother again and concluded, "I don't think I'm wrong for stepping in now."

"What?"

The simulated Jiang Yanli respectfully saluted Jin Zixun and the others. Some returned the salute, but most were too bewildered to bother.

She stood up tall.

"Young Master Jin, from what you said, am I to understand that A-Xian took a third of the prey at Phoenix Mountain all to himself, an action which was in defiance of the rules? I… I must admit I hadn't known. I apologize to you in his place."

She bowed.

"Shijie!" Wei Wuxian protested.

Madam Yu felt her hackles raise.

'I knew that daughter of mine was too soft. Look at this! All she's doing is lowering her and the sect's position! And, of course, because of Wei Wuxian. She and Jiang Fengmian are the same. How can she expect anyone to respect her after this?!'

Jiang Yanli remained there, head lowered, but a shake of her head prevented Wei Wuxian from coming to her aid. Jin Zixun appeared quite smug at the sight.

(Jin Zixuan, who had been watching from the side, had to look away at this.)

"Maiden Jiang, you really are kind and understanding," Jin Zixun laughed. "What your shidi did was unacceptable and caused us a lot of trouble, but I can see you recognize that. Then, for Maiden Jiang and Sect Leader Jiang's sake, an apology won't be necessary. The Yunmeng Jiang Sect and Lanling Jin Sect are as close as siblings after all."

"As close as siblings?" Jiang Cheng parroted. "What was all this about then?"

He was furious. At Jin Zixun's words, at that fact that his sister had to bow to him, ~~at Wei Wuxian, for causing it all.~~

But then:

"However," Jiang Yanli rose, "I may have not participated in a competition like this ever before, but I think I would have heard if someone had ever gotten in trouble for hunting too much prey. May I ask, you accused A-Xian of breaking the rules — what rule, specifically, did he happen to break?"

The Jins paused, their smiles frozen in place.

And Jin Zixuan's eyes widened.

"Oh," Wen Qing said, pleasantly surprised. "I see."

"Hm," Wen Ruohan hummed, leaning back in his chair and scanning over Jiang Yanli once again.

When Madam Yu was angry at Wei Wuxian, Jiang Yanli would try to intervene. However, her interventions were almost always distracting Madam Yu or getting her father involved. Confronting her mother directly wasn't something that worked in the Jiang household.

But right now, she wasn't just a daughter. Her position was high enough to make her equal to anyone here, so long as she didn't let herself fall.

"Both my paternal grandmother and Jiujiu held my mom in high regard," Jin Ling said with no small amount of pride. "Jin Zixun wasn't sure how much force to use when he confronted her, as she had never gone against him before. And, more importantly, there was no rule he could use to back up his own argument. There was nothing he could say."

At that moment, however, Sect Leader Yao jumped in: "Maiden Jiang, that's not how one should phrase it. There are some rules that, although they aren't written out, are understood and followed by everyone involved."

"Yeah!" someone else shouted.

"How much prey was on Phoenix Mountain in total? There were less than 500 targets, right? And how many people came to this hunt? At least five thousand! We're fighting for prey to begin with. If he takes so much for himself using wicked means, what can other people do?"

Wei Wuxian glared, shifting to step forward only to pause when he saw Jiang Yanli's hand gesturing for him to hold back.

"It's best if you don't say anything," she whispered.

"What?" Lan Xichen asked. "Why shouldn't he-"

"I assume because he's 'only' the son of a servant, in their eyes," Wen Qing glared. "They can't respond back to criticism from Maiden Jiang because, as Jin Ling said, she has Madam Jin and Sect Leader Jiang on her side. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand…."

"He has me on his side too!" Jiang Cheng insisted. "Just because Jin Zixun doesn't know about it doesn't mean it's not there! This isn't the far future me, this is… that Jiang Cheng's only a little older than me."

And sure, he'd choked Wei Wuxian after the Massacre of Lotus Pier and blamed him for what happened, but everyone here knew he didn't really mean that.

~~Probably.~~

"He can't just be allowed to get away with this!"

"There's a spirit of competition involved. He's practically spitting on it."

"If he hadn't done that, I would have been able to get at least one!"

"Eh?" Jiang Yanli appeared confused. "But… it isn't his fault others weren't able to catch any prey."

The man who had just spoken floundered, unable to respond.

"Isn't the hunt all about true strength? Even if the ghouls are gone, there are also Yao and Guai. Even if he hadn't gotten one third of the prey — even if he hadn't come to the hunt at all — those who are incapable of getting anything would have remained so."

"Ooh!" Nie Huaisang gasped, wishing once again he had his fan to hide behind. This was honestly one of the most entertaining conversations he had ever witnessed.

(Nie Mingjue sighed at his brother, but didn't really object.)

"Although A-Xian's methods were different from other people's, it's still an ability powered by cultivation. You can't call it the crooked path just because it deprived you of your prey, can you?"

The faces of the people in Jin Zixun's camp darkened.

And yet, looking at the high quality robes she wore, whose vibrant colors identified her with the Jiangs… looking at Madam Jin, who stood watching from the right… looking at Jin Zixuan, who continued not taking their side….

They gritted their teeth.

'I can't say anything in response,' they all thought.

Jiang Cheng clicked his tongue: 'You shouldn't be able to spout drivel about Wei Wuxian either! He… he does have my support. I'm sure of it!'

Wei Wuxian just didn't need as much support as Jiang Yanli did. That was why none of them had thought that in regards to him.

(Except, if you were to ask Lan Wangji, Wei Wuxian had very clearly needed support, and he was only now getting it from Jiang Yanli.)

Lan Wangji frowned.

'We're not in the same sect, not even friends, but… I should have done more too.'

(Though, considering his other self had just kissed Wei Wuxian, who knew what was going through Hanguang-jun's mind at that point in time.)

"Besides, hunting is hunting, so why are you bringing the matter of discipline onto the table?" Jiang Yanli asked. "A-Xian is a disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect. He grew up with my brother and I. Calling him 'the son of a servant,' I'm sorry but… I won't accept this. And thus… I hope Young Master Jin Zixun will apologize to Wei Wuxian of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect!"

"I… she must be joking," Jin Guangshan gaped.

"A-Li, why are you being so serious?" the simulated Madam Jin asked. "It's just a small matter. Don't get so worked up."

"Madam, A-Xian is my younger brother. To me, him being humiliated by others isn't a small matter."

Brother.

Just brother. Not martial brother or brother-like friend or 'my brother's friend.'

Brother.

Jin Zixuan stared; Lan Xichen was speechless; Nie Mingjue's eyes were wide; Jiang Cheng was stunned; Lan Qiren was gaping; Lan Wangji couldn't take his eyes away.

'Oh, well played,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'Simply bringing up hypocrisy wouldn't stop them — it certainly wouldn't be enough to stop me, at least, and bringing up classism with that lot would have an even smaller chance of working. But by making him your brother… by turning him into a true member of the gentry through your protection… there's much less Jin Zixun can do. Attacks on him are attacks on the Jiang Sect now. That was exactly the way for someone in your situation to go about this.'

She was still far too passive for his tastes, and, more impactfully, far too normal. He would never really be interested in her as she was by herself, but…

'I suppose I'm starting to see why Wei Wuxian respects her so much. Although she doesn't capture my interest, I can't necessarily say he's wrong for thinking so anymore.'

Fascinating.

Finally, caving into Jiang Yanli's request, Madam Jin looked over and said, "You heard her, Zixun."

“Auntie!” he protested.

Nie Mingjue was legitimately getting fed up with the sound of his voice.

‘He’s not going to do it unless I force him,’ Madam Jin realized. ‘If he does apologize, he’ll definitely throw a few tantrums after he’s returned to Koi Tower. I almost want to just hold him down by the neck and force him to say sorry!’

Jin Guangshan shivered, very familiar with his wife being in such moods.

At that moment, however, two new swords came down from the sky .

“Xiongzhang,” Lan Wangji greeted.

“Brother,” the real one said as well.

Lan Xichen smiled in response, though felt his internal happiness fade upon seeing who landed with him.

“Meng Yao,” Nie Mingjue observed.

And indeed, it was. The same man who had smiled pleasantly while Qin Su accused him of killing their child was now giving the exact same smile as he and Lan Xichen landed. Seeing that, Madam Jin frowned.

“Still smiling? Such a big thing happened, and you’re still smiling?! Just look at the hunt you organized you good for nothing.”

Several people did a double take, stunned by the whiplash of Madam Jin’s interactions with Jiang Yanli versus Jin Guangyao. Right now, she was clearly fuming.

Both Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen couldn’t help but frown slightly, despite everything, and the real Madam Jin felt a complicated twist in her stomach as she watched her other self’s reaction.

(Jin Guangyao would go on to do reprehensible things, and had already done several actions that were extremely difficult to justify.)

(However, none of that played a part in why Madam Jin was treating him that way.)

Having retracted his smile at Madam Jin’s scoldings, Jin Guangyao asked, “Mother, what is going on?”

Madam Jin narrowed her eyes: “What’s going on? Can’t you see for yourself? Aren’t you supposed to be good at reading the atmosphere?!”

When faced with the abject hate Madam Jin seemed to direct Jin Guangyao’s way, several people gained slightly awkward expressions.

(Even Madam Jin had to admit it beared a striking resemblance to things Madam Yu had told Wei Wuxian. The main difference was that Wei Wuxian wasn't Jiang Fengmian's bastard child, someone had just made that up.)

(Unfortunately, that distinction didn't necessarily mean that Madam Jin was justified now.)

And, at that moment, Jin Zixun decided to explain: "One third of the prey on the mountain is gone! What are the five thousand people on the mountain supposed to hunt for?"

He was about to continue, but Lan Xichen spoke up first: "Lianfeng-zun has already set about expanding the area of the hunting grounds. Please calm down, everyone."

Jin Zixun frowned, looking as though he wanted to continue complaining, but held himself back.

'Now that Zewu-jun's spoken up, I can't exactly say any more.'

Jiang Yanli showed no reaction to the abject difference in Jin Zixun's reaction toward her and Lan Xichen's words, but the first jade of Lan frowned at it. He couldn't exactly say he was surprised to see this, but it bothered him nonetheless.

Seeing that, Nie Mingjue couldn't help but mutter, "Makes you wonder what they would have said if either of us had been the ones to use demonic cultivation, huh?"

Lan Xichen's frown deepened at those words, but he couldn't write them off either.

Finally, Jin Zixun threw his arrows onto the ground.

"Ha! This hunt is a farce! Nevermind, it'll make no difference whether I participate or not. I quit."

Jin Guangyao hurried to interject, "Zixun, it'll soon be arranged. It'll take at most an hour for the hunt to resume-"

Sect Leader Yao scoffed: "Young Master Jin, that's really not necessary."

Jin Zixun nodded, adding, "This hunt has really lost all sense of fairness. Why should I wait? Please excuse my absence."

He and his entourage hopped onto their swords and flew away in a frustrated manner that would have surely manifested itself as angrily stomping if they'd had to walk away. Jin Guangyao's calls after them were ignored. Even those who hadn't immediately left looked quite uncomfortable.

After a moment's pause, Jiang Yanli turned to Madam Jin and bowed: "I apologize, Madam Jin. I made trouble."

Madam Jin waved her hand dismissively: "You could never make trouble for your mother in law. Scold that dumb brat however you want. It's not like I care about him. If you're still mad, I can help you beat him up."

Although the simulated Jiang Yanli, having spent a significant amount of time with Madam Jin, seemed unsurprised by this offer, the real one couldn't help but give a startled laugh at Madam Jin's enthusiasm.

Jin Zixuan, meanwhile, was beyond mortified.

'Zixun, you were acting like a toddler!' he thought, body nearly going purple in embarrassment. 'I can't believe A-Li had to see that! I can't believe you did that to Wei Wuxian! You were basically acting like Wen Chao was during the archery competition!'

He was legitimately considering trying to melt into the floor.

Meanwhile, Jiang Yanli had turned down Madam Jin's offer with as much grace as ever. However, seeing how far the situation had escalated, it seemed all for the best to depart.

"...Then, I'll take my leave first," she said at last, bowing one more time.

"To the watchtowers? Then I'll get Zixuan to walk us back."

As Madam Jin offered that, she glanced over at her son, who stood some distance away and was looking at the ground.

Seeing that, Jiang Yanli faltered.

The real version of Jin Zixuan had managed to surprise her time and time again. He had been nervous and awkward, but earnest and sweet, too. As for the simulated version…

He had stepped in to defend Luo Qingyang in the Xuanwu cave, but, no matter how many years passed, his lack of interest in the simulated Jiang Yanli seemed constant.

'The real A-Xuan has been kind, and I… don't think he's faking the interest in me he's shown,' she thought. 'But the simulated one… how long will it take for him to at least like being with me? With how awkwardly he was walking in that earlier scene… I suppose if he's just here on his mother's orders that makes sense, but…'

How was she supposed to enjoy spending time with someone who so clearly didn't want to spend time with her?

And, glancing back at Jin Zixuan for just a moment, Jiang Yanli seemed to come to the same conclusion.

"There's no need, Madam Jin," she said. "I'd like to speak with A-Xian for a little while. He can walk me back."

At those words, Madam Jin paused and looked Wei Wuxian up and down skeptically. Her gaze was cautious, and her displeasure was obvious.

“A young man and a young woman… you two can’t stick together all the time if no one else is present.”

“A-Xian is my younger brother,” Jiang Yanli answered evenly.

And Jin Zixuan was very, very glad about that. It wasn’t that he thought he wouldn’t stand a chance if Wei Wuxian and Jiang Yanli were interested in each other, but….

Wei Wuxian, furious with his dismissal of Jiang Yanli, had pushed Jin Zixuan up against a wall.

Jin Zixuan had been equally antagonistic, suggesting, ‘If she’s unsatisfied, tell her to get rid of the engagement!’

‘You-’

‘What? Am I wrong? If you like her so much, why don’t you talk to her father? If you want her, I don’t think he’d object.’

…Well, perhaps that was just another reason to be glad Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji seemed to have fallen for each other at first sight.

But Madam Jin, unaware of that, remained firm.

“A-Li, please don’t be angry. Tell me what stupid thing that stubborn brat of mine did to you this time-”

Jin Zixuan flinched.

“I’ll tell him to make it up to you properly.”

However, at those words, the real Jiang Yanli’s smile dimmed even more. She couldn’t help but remember how her meetings with Jin Zixuan before the simulation always went. He would be cold, curt, and, while polite, clearly uninterested.

You couldn’t really control whether you were attracted to someone. She couldn’t blame him for how he felt.

But, try as she might, she hadn’t been able to make him more interested in their engagement, either.

And yet they kept being told to spend time together, and his annoyance had always shown through.

“...That’s really not necessary, Madam Jin,” Jiang Yanli said. “Don’t force him.”

“How could I be forcing him?” she shook her head. “He’s not being forced at all.”

At that moment, Wei Wuxian bowed and said, “Please excuse my absence, Madam Jin.”

Jiang Yanli bowed as well.

They were ready to leave.

The awkwardness was palpable. Many of the watchers looked away.

“Wait!” Madam Jin insisted, reaching forward to grab Jiang Yanli’s hand and stop her.

“Madam Jin? Please-”

“Maiden Jiang!”

Jin Zixuan jumped, hearing his other self’s shout. As the simulated Jin Zixuan approached, he felt his mood drop.

‘Just go away,’ he thought to his older self. ‘All you ever do is make everything worse.’

Wei Wuxian, similarly, was not interested in his conversation.

“Come on, Shijie. Let’s go,” he said, trying to pull her along. But-

“That’s not it, Maiden Jiang!” Jin Zixuan yelled at the top of his lungs. A fierce blush began to spread across his cheeks.

Confused at those words, Wei Wuxian, Jiang Yanli, and many of the watchers (both simulated and real) turned towards him.

“What isn’t it?” the real Jiang Yanli asked, confused.

“That’s not it Maiden Jiang! It wan’t my mother! It wasn’t a result of her actions! I’m not being forced to spend time with you at all!” he shouted, and then, breathing in, roared, “It was me! I was the one who wanted you to come!”

Silence reigned supreme both within the simulation and throughout the watchers.

Then, a little laugh.

“Oh,” Nie Huaisang said, a far-too-wide grin on his face. “I see.”

And then, suddenly, the meaning of Jin Zixuan’s words seemed to click for everyone.

(Including Jin Zixuan himself.)

He stumbled back. One step, two steps. Three. Slowly, he looked around, as if suddenly realizing there was an enormous crowd of people there, all watching him move.

He froze.

Then, with a shout, he fled.

“You idiot! Why are you running away?!” Madam Jin demanded. “A-Li, we’ll continue our talk later. First, I have to catch him!”

She broke off into a mad sprint.

And, watching this whole scene, the simulated Jiang Yanli suddenly laughed. It wasn’t the distantly polite smile she had kept the whole time, nor an act to keep up appearances. It was a real, genuine laugh.

There was a strange amount of amusement all around, mostly from the surprise that had just happened. They might have known Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan ended up together by the end, and they might have been aware that Jin Zixuan did seem to be nervous around her before, but…

“That was… spectacularly awful,” Nie Mingjue bluntly said.

The words pierced Jin Zixuan’s chest like an arrow.

Jiang Cheng humphed: “Well, it’s the least A-Jie deserves.”

Madam Yu nodded in agreement.

“Perhaps we should take up Young Master Nie’s suggestion about teaching rules for romance and courting during the disciple exchange,” Lan Qiren sighed. “I, for one, am not interested in seeing things like this anymore.”

A second arrow struck Jin Zixuan’s heart.

Slowly, as calm as ever, Lan Wangji walked over to Jin Zixuan. The actions his other self had taken with Wei Wuxian were not things he could or should forget about, but he needed more time to think it through. For now, though, there was one thing obvious to him.

“I understand,” he said, looking at the abject embarrassment coloring the Jin heir’s whole body.

And with that, the third shot landed! Jin Zixuan fell to the floor, unable to take it anymore.

“Please just stop!” he cried out, nearly tearing up in agony.

After staring for a bit in disbelief, Wei Wuxian just groaned: “What is he doing? Shijie, let’s go.”

After pausing for a moment, a little dazed from what just occurred, Jiang Yanli nodded.

“Great,” Wei Wuxian said, then glanced back at Lan Wangji to add, “Lan Zhan, I’m going.”

Lan Wangji nodded, saying nothing.

‘That was probably for the best,’ the real Lan Wangji decided, very carefully ignoring the sighs of disappointment around him.

On the other hand, having failed to stop Jin Zixun, Jin Guangyao finally returned. He approached Lan Xichen, forcing himself to smile all the while.

“Ah, this… really is…”

“Today’s disturbance was not your fault,” Lan Xichen assured him, patting his shoulder a few times.

Jin Guangyao sighed and massaged the center of his brows, confessing, “I’m afraid even two hours won’t be enough time to fix this mess.”

“Why is that?”

“You see, not only did Young Master Wei keep a third of the prey to himself, but Da-ge single-handedly eliminated over half of the remaining prey.”

Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen froze.

The simulated Lan Xichen just laughed: “That’s what Da-ge is like, after all.”

Hearing that, Lan Xichen frowned.

He was trying to alleviate Jin Guangyao’s concerns. The lighthearted tone he was using was probably in part an effort to help Jin Guangyao relax. And yet, when coupled with what had just occurred….

Lan Xichen didn’t find it at all strange that Nie Mingjue had taken another third of the prey for himself.

And yet, when he found people speaking against Wei Wuxian for doing that exact same thing, he had said nothing in response.

(To the side, he noticed Jiang Yanli frown. A look of discontentment crossed her face. She hadn’t really expected anything else, but to think that, even in the end, Jin Zixun had still refused to apologize despite her request. As always, she had the best of intentions in mind.)

(She just never had the power required to actually make a change.)

But Lan Xichen had also been there. He might have emotionally had fewer reasons to try to help, but he had far more ability to interfere than she did.

‘Makes you wonder what they would have said if either of us had been the ones to use demonic cultivation, huh?’ Nie Mingjue asked.

They didn’t even have to be the ones who had used it. If Lan Xichen had just supported what Wei Wuxian had done-

And Nie Mingjue, to his side, frowned deeper than ever before.

He had speculated about what they would do if he had been the one to invent demonic cultivation. If he had, as hard as it was to believe, he had thought it was entirely possible no one would raise a fuss. Perhaps, he had thought, if he had taken a third of the prey, no one would object.

He hadn't thought he would get that theory confirmed so quickly.

(Because this wasn't just speculation anymore. He had taken a third of the prey. He was half the reason it was so hard for the contestants to hunt. And not a single person seemed to care.)

While this pair had been caught up in their own thoughts, the simulated versions had set about expanding the hunting range (with Lan Wangji volunteering to help as well). They left on their swords, meaning there were only a few people still in that section of the forest chatting about what had just occurred. A short while later, Jiang Cheng strode out of the woods.

He looked around at the gathered cultivators in confusion.

"Sect Leader Yao, what happened here?" he wondered.

"Ah, Sect Leader Jiang," Sect Leader Yao greeted back. "Your sect's Wei Wuxian is quite a character."

"...What are you trying to say?" Jiang Cheng asked, beginning to frown.

Sect Leader Yao began to laugh: "I wouldn't dare to imply anything. Sect Leader Jiang, you mustn't take what I said to heart!"

But what he'd just let slip was already more than enough to make Jiang Cheng's face darken.

'I'll find Wei Wuxian later and shake the full story out of him.'

He turned around and began to leave, but, as he did, couldn't help but hear the words of a few in the distance.

"Yunmeng's Lotus Pier was really the star of the show this time, huh? Almost all the spirits and corpses were summoned to the Yunmeng Jiang Sect's ground. There'll definitely be a number of cultivators interested in joining them."

"Well, what can we do about that?" Sect Leader Yao responded with a sigh. "It's not our fault our sect's don't have a Wei Wuxian."

"It's not necessarily a good thing to have Wei Wuxian. I wouldn't want to have a member of my sect always stirring up trouble."

And of course, Jin Zixun, Jin Zixuan, Lan Wangji, and Jiang Yanli's roles in the situation went unmentioned.

“Wei Wuxian… he really is too bold. Anyways, from now on, I won’t be attending any night hunts he’s going to.”

And having heard what they were discussing, a third voice added on, “Huh? You think those cultivators will be interested in Yunmeng? I don’t think so. To put it simply, they’re interested in Wei Wuxian, aren’t they? Didn’t the Yunmeng Jiang Sect grow in renown during the Sunshot Campaign only because of Wei Wuxian?”

And that was a good thing. It was something to be proud of, for a disciple to bring fame to their sect. No one would be angry at their disciple for helping like that.

And yet, those words made Jiang Cheng’s face darken that much more.

And the real Jiang Cheng could only watch that in silence.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, I could have made all the watchers see the kiss between LWJ and WWX, and many of you were actually expecting me to. However, I'm afraid I'm just not physically capable of surviving the second hand embarrassment that would result from writing Lan Qiren actually see that, so from day one that was never going to happen, sorry! lol

I've included MDZS Q Episode 12: Comparing Heights and the Audio Drama Extra: Tossing Flowers (in case anyone was curious as to where those scenes came from).

Thanks for reading!

A-Yuan Arrives!!!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Hey, brat!" an elderly woman's voice called out, harsh and impatient. "There's someone here to see you."

"See me?" Meng Yao asked, setting his quill down on an inkstone.

"Seems like it," she said, her plump belly jiggling slightly as she began to laugh. "It's a pretty wealthy-looking young cultivator too. Maybe she heard about how much use Sect Leader Jin got out of your mom and wants to try you out too!"

Uproarious laughter took over the shop, and Meng Yao very nearly felt his smile crack.

"No, no, Madam." A voice came from outside the room, and one of the younger workers stepped in shortly after. "You only saw from a distance, but I stayed just behind the boss and got to see up close. He's got a very pretty face, but the cultivator who came is a boy. A handsome one too!"

Sounds of interest spread throughout the shop (along with a few sounds of disappointment from the male workers who had been quite excited until that was revealed). Moving his arms faster, Meng Yao began to put away his work as quickly as possible.

(He really should be able to just put his project down and go see the visitor, but past experience told him that, if he did that, it would undoubtedly be sabotaged by the time he got back. Being a shop's bookkeeper was usually a position that came with a fair bit of authority.)

(It turned out, however, that if everyone knew you as 'the person who was thrown down the stairs of Koi Tower' it didn't matter what your position supposedly was. Everyone felt free to say whatever they wanted about you.)

"Maybe Madam Jin sent someone to finish the job," an elderly crafter speculated, and Meng Yao's movements paused.

"I don't think so," the youngest worker continued, eager for gossip. "Given his robes, I'm pretty sure he's part of the Jiang Sect. I've even heard his name before: he introduced himself as 'Wei Wuxian.'"

"What?" Meng Yao asked, turning away from the door he was about to exit through. "You said his name was Wei Wuxian?!"

"Eh? You know that name?"

"Well of course he does," one of the men whispered to her. "I hear he still looks up everything he can on the cultivation world in his spare time. Thinks he'll be able to join the ranks of immortals if he just asks enough."

“No, no, I’ve heard the name ‘Wei Wuxian’ too,” a twenty year old woman mentioned. “He’s fourth on the list of the cultivation world’s most eligible bachelors. After the Great Sleep began, he all but took over the Jiang Sect. He’s one of the most important figures in the cultivation world right now.”

The Shop’s Madam furrowed her brows at that, glancing at Meng Yao and asking, “What would someone like that want with you?”

“...I suppose I’ll have to ask him,” was all Meng Yao said in response, giving a pleasant smile as he exited the room at last.

~~Meng Yao didn’t have the rank required to backtalk them. If anyone accused him of pilfering funds now, the shop owner would throw him out without a second thought. So Meng Yao would wait and wait and wait and wait, and then, when he was finally ready to leave, he would make them regret everything they’d said.~~

The clicks of his footsteps as he moved down the hall increased in speed.

The Madam wasn’t completely wrong in her judgment. Meng Yao was quite confident in his ability, but he wasn’t so naive as to think that Wei Wuxian could gain anything from him as he was now. From what he had heard, Wei Wuxian had both Wen Ruohan and Jiang Fengmian’s protection, making him the center point of an alliance between two of the most powerful sects. Given that everyone knew the Jin and Jiang were already ‘as close as siblings,’ the Jiang Sect was now in a very comfortable position.

‘Maybe… he’s trying to use me as a weapon against my father?’ Meng Yao wondered. ‘What happened was quite a scandal. Maybe he thinks bringing me back will bring what happened into everyone’s minds again.’

The last thing Meng Yao wanted was to cause trouble for his father. If it seemed like that was the case, Meng Yao would just have to politely refuse. He mentally prepared himself then opened the door-

“G-gege!” a voice cried out. It was a young child’s voice — something almost never heard in this part of town. Meng Yao looked down and saw a young, wide-eyed child staring back up at him.

“Um… I…”

On principle, Meng Yao was almost never speechless. This, however, was certainly enough to give him pause.

“Try again, A-Yu,” someone whisper-yelled from behind. It was, if Meng Yao wasn’t mistaken, Wei Wuxian cheering the child on. Regardless, his words did seem to be enough to spark some last bits of bravery in the young boy and he made another attempt.

“H-hello, Gege. My… I’m A-Yu. Mo Yu,” he stumbled out, blushing in embarrassment as he went on. “I’m… I’m happy to have seen you-”

“Meet you,” Wei Wuxian whispered. “We agreed on ‘meet you.’”

“Ah, right! I-I’m happy to meet you, Ge-ge. I mean it’s nice to meet you,” the boy continued, shifting his weight from his right foot to his left at a rapid pace. “I-I hope we get along and- and I’m very happy to meet you!”

Those last few words seemed to be too much for the young boy and he turned around and buried himself in maybe-Wei Wuxian’s waiting arms.

Meng Yao was thoroughly lost.

“Great job, A-Yu,” maybe-Wei Wuxian said, standing up with ‘Mo Yu’ still in his arms. “I’m very proud of you.”

The little boy nodded and relaxed at the praise, but didn’t seem willing to peek out from where he was hiding in Wei Wuxian’s chest quite yet.

Well, there were many questions Meng Yao had, but standing there gawking wasn’t going to help. At this point, he had no choice but to rely on his backup plan and just try to get his introduction out of the way as quickly as possible. Maybe then everything would start making at least a little sense again.

He closed the door and entered the room, giving the young man in front of him another look.

(Was this really Wei Wuxian? The quality of his Jiang robes and the steely confidence in his gaze did seem to support that, but the child in his arms made Meng Yao hesitate. On the other hand, why would anyone spend so much money and effort towards impersonating Wei Wuxian, a man Meng Yao had never met, just to meet with him?)

Desperate for answers, Meng Yao forced a smile and said, “Wei Wuxian, I take it? It’s nice to meet you. My name is Meng Yao. I was told you wanted to see me. May I… may I ask who this is?”

The child in Wei Wuxian’s arms jumped slightly, making Wei Wuxian pat him on the back a few times as he said, “It’s nice to meet you too. I am Wei Wuxian, and this is Mo Yu, your… your half brother.”

“Excuse me?” Meng Yao asked, stiffening up immediately. He had heard the boy calling him “gege,” but he had assumed the child meant ‘older boy in my proximity,’ not ‘actual older brother.’

“I hope you’ll excuse the confusing introduction,” Wei Wuxian continued. “I’ve been trying to get A-Yu to open up more around people he doesn’t know, but he’s been having a lot of trouble. However, when I mentioned to him that the person we were going to meet was his brother, he seemed a little more willing.”

“Did… did I do good?” a tiny voice asked.

“You did great!” Wei Wuxian responded immediately, and seemed serious about his praise too. “It was a flawless introduction, A-Yu. Your brother was very impressed.”

Meng Yao wasn't, but he didn't see a need to mention that.

Most especially because now, at least, he was starting to understand why someone as important as Wei Wuxian would visit him.

"I apologize for saying so, Wei-gongzi, but I'm afraid I have neither the ability nor the means to take care of a child right now, my half brother or not," Meng Yao said, making sure to interject the right amount of regret and misery into his tone. "I assure you, when such a time comes that I am more suitable I would be happy to-"

He paused, seeing Wei Wuxian hold up a single hand calmly (his other being used to carry Mo Yu).

"You can relax, Meng Yao," he said. "I would have come to see you with or without Mo Yu's presence."

Strike that. Meng Yao once again had no earthly clue what Wei Wuxian was here for.

(To be perfectly honest, Wei Wuxian was still somewhat uncertain about that too.)

A few hours before, Jiang Fengmian and Wen Ning had left to visit Wen Xu. Wei Wuxian would've been annoyed about being left behind, but the knowledge that it was because of Wen Chao's dogs made it hard to complain. Besides, not long after, he got another call from the future. When he slipped into the discussion zone, he found three people waiting for him: Mo Xuanyu, the future's Nie Huaisang, and the future version of the first jade of Lan, Lan Xichen.

And they had a lot to talk about.

Although everyone (both in the future and among the watchers) still seemed pretty determined to keep the specific contents of the simulation a secret, those in the future had come to the decision that there was a lot Wei Wuxian needed to know about Meng Yao. They had already brought up creating an organization to deal with people like Xue Yang in a peaceful manner, and Jiang Fengmian had told him everything he could about Xue Yang after waking up. Now, the second individual they were highly worried about had to be addressed. And they had given Wei Wuxian his full life story.

There was only one slight issue: Wei Wuxian still wasn't sure whether he should believe them.

Sure, he did like Huaisang when they'd run into each other at previous discussion conferences. The time he had spent working on improving the Píngxíng Gateway with Mo Xuanyu had been fun, and the first jade of Lan had an impeccable reputation.

Still, he had to wonder.

(If Meng Yao's initial social position and then subsequent rise to power meant people were willing to lie to get a version of him taken out in the past, even if it wouldn't affect their world, then Wei Wuxian would have to be very careful about how much faith he put in their words.)

Which was why, at the suggestion of Mo Xuanyu, surprisingly enough, he would start off by getting to know Meng Yao first hand.

“The reason I asked to see you, Meng Yao, is because I have a job offer for you,” Wei Wuxian declared. “Would you have any interest in becoming my secretary?”

“I… I beg your pardon?”

“I won’t be making you a disciple of the Jiang. However, if you want to join another sect after the first stage of the project is complete, I would be happy to write you a letter of recommendation, depending on how well you perform with me. The Jiang Sect is looking to create an organization that will interact more with civilians than cultivators, and it will need employees that are disconnected from the sect.”

“And you’re offering me a position there?”

“Mmhm,” Wei Wuxian nodded. “I’ve heard a lot about you, you see.”

As Wei Wuxian had expected, Meng Yao had to suppress the tension that filled his body at those words.

(Which was fair, as the information Wei Wuxian had gotten about him allegedly made him out to be the single most hated individual worldwide in the future.)

(If it was true, of course.)

‘Alright then, I’ll go meet up with him,’ Wei Wuxian had decided.

‘Really?’ Mo Xuanyu had asked. ‘And what’re you going to tell him? I don’t mind you telling him everything, but I doubt he’d believe you.’

‘Don’t tell him anything!’ Nie Huaisang cried out. ‘Wei-xiong, he’s terrifying! Oh, you-you really do need to be careful. I’ve heard that giving him information will let him see into your soul! I mean I-I didn’t ever see him do anything awful myself, but the things I’ve heard*. Be on guard, Wei-xiong! Don’t let him find out you don’t trust him!’*

Mo Xuanyu had seemed somewhat amused by Nie Huaisang’s frantic outburst, but the first jade of Lan had been disapproving.

‘He’s rather intelligent,’ Lan Xichen pointed out. ‘If you lie to him about why you’re spending time with him and he finds out the truth later… he’ll lose all trust in you.’

It had seemed like a rather odd thing to say with how much information they were keeping from him, but Wei Wuxian had decided to not press that point. Especially since Mo Xuanyu hadn’t taken a side.

‘You can decide,’ he had said. ‘I’ll support whatever choice you make.’

‘Eh? But Mo-xiong!’

‘Huh? But Wei… you want Wei Wuxian to decide? He’s only fifteen.’

‘I don’t see why not,’ Mo Xuanyu had shrugged. ‘You’ve both said your pieces, but he’s the one who’ll actually have to live in that world. Wei Wuxian, I’d like you to think about what they’ve said. However, make any decision you want. I think you’ll be able to decide that better than anyone else.’

It was a strange offer. Mo Xuanyu had been one of the main forces keeping information from him. And yet, today, he had delivered a full novel’s worth of facts about Meng Yao and then had given no instructions, instead trusting Wei Wuxian to decide.

‘Are you sure?’ Wei Wuxian had asked, grinning a little. ‘Seems a bit unusual for you.’

‘Well, Nie-xiong has been advising me to trust you a little more,’ Mo Xuanyu had confessed, making the future Nie Huaisang hurriedly snap open his fan and hide his blushing face behind it.

‘Oh, I got an endorsement!’ Wei Wuxian had said, delighted. ‘Alright then, I’ll try to not disappoint!’

So, there became a question of how much to tell Meng Yao.

(Which was complicated by the fact that Wei Wuxian didn’t even know how much of their story to believe.)

As such…

“What have you heard, exactly?” Meng Yao asked, looking as though he regretted it a moment later. The continued surprises had left him a little off his game today. He was used to chasing after opportunities after having a lot of time to consider them; he’d never had one seek him out before.

It was a dangerous state to be in, when he still didn’t know what Wei Wuxian was after.

However, at that moment, Wei Wuxian smiled.

“Like I said: a lot. I’ve heard about your relationship with your father, and about what happened at your infamous birthday.”

This time, having expected it, Meng Yao managed to withhold his flinch.

“I heard some less than flattering things about your character too. Enough to make me worried about you.”

“What-” Meng Yao asked. But-

“And I’ve also heard that you’re one of the most talented people around, and intelligent enough to change the world. I've been told you're quite ambitious, and that you're willing to put work in to get what you want."

Here, Meng Yao took a half step back, having even less clue than before as to what Wei Wuxian was after.

"...Who have you heard that from?" Meng Yao asked.

"Can't tell you quite yet I'm afraid," Wei Wuxian responded bluntly. "But you can rest assured that I don't completely trust their account on any of it."

Meng Yao felt his smile falter again. He knew what he was capable of, but he couldn't think of anyone who would say the same. With his reputation, being the bookkeeper for this shop was something he had to fight tooth and nail to keep, and the Madam, who had benefited immensely from his work, wasn't so stupid as to go bragging about that and risk someone else stealing him away.

And as for the disparaging remarks on his character… everyone here thought of him as a polite, quiet, talented punching bag. He was a pushover, in their eyes. Even those who didn't see him like that just felt pity for him.

Was this just one of the rumors that cropped up as a result of his mother's occupation?

(Or had he slipped up and let someone discover his revenge plan too soon?)

"...Then the job offer?"

"It's genuine," Wei Wuxian said. "What I was told was concerning enough for me to not be able to overlook you but was also completely hearsay. I don't actually have any reason to believe it."

"Then?"

"Then, if I wanna know whether any of it's true, I guess I better get to know you!" Wei Wuxian bowed once and saluted him — as though he were meeting an equal instead of a disgraced bastard — and grinned. "I'll introduce myself again. My name is Wei Wuxian, head disciple of the YunmengJiang Sect. I've heard many things about you, including how skilled of a leader you are. I'm creating an organization that will interact with citizens and deal with the parts of cultivation that don't involve killing monsters. I'm looking for someone to work there, and simultaneously want to make sure you're not a threat. I swear by my name to not allow any harm to come to you unless I know for a fact that you've done something to deserve it. You'll be paid twenty times what you're paid now, get all your living necessities taken care of, and get a connection to one of the world's most powerful sects, if you perform well. Now then, how would you feel about working for me?"

In a rare turn of events, Meng Yao was nearly speechless. This was possibly dangerous. Wei Wuxian already admitted he didn't fully trust him, and who knew exactly what he'd been told. And he might be lying about all of it, for all Meng Yao knew.

But…

But.

Wei Wuxian was being frighteningly blunt. Anyone trying to trick Meng Yao into coming would have to be stupid to mention that lack of trust. At the very least, it did seem like Wei Wuxian was trying to set up a long term relationship. That didn't mean he had Meng Yao's best interests at heart, but...

Meng Yao had been kicked out of Koi Tower quite unceremoniously, and had no way of fulfilling his mother's desire and making it back there as of yet. He had no true cultivation experience and was now far too old for any sect to accept him without a dramatic change in circumstances. He wanted to make it back to Koi Tower — needed to make it back to Koi Tower — but, for the last few months, it had seemed rather hopeless.

However, in recent weeks, there were many rumors flying around regarding Wei Wuxian. They now said he had gained the approval of at least two, maybe three, of the Great Sects' Sect Leaders. Rumors had spread that Jin Guangshan's orders were preventing Jin Zixun from taking action against Wei Wuxian, despite how much he wanted to. If Jin Guangshan's approval of Wei Wuxian was truly so high….

Now, at long last, Meng Yao was possibly seeing a pathway to his goal.

(But Wei Wuxian would have to be telling the truth for that to be the case.)

Little Mo Yu peaked out of Wei Wuxian's chest, watching Meng Yao tentatively.

"...You have doubts as to my character, and yet let him introduce himself to me?" Meng Yao asked. "Wouldn't I be more scary than a random stranger?"

But, despite his still-present fear, the young boy shook his head rapidly.

"You're my gege," he said.

Bouncing Mo Yu in his arms a few times, Wei Wuxian explained, "His mother has told him a lot about his father. The two of you are related through your father, so everything his mother has told him about Jin Guangshan was applied, in his head, to you."

"Really?" Meng Yao laughed, finding a strange sort of irony in the similarities of their upbringing. "How did he end up with you, then?"

"...His mom loved him, but the rest of the family thought her claims that the sect leader would return were… a bit hard to believe. I offered to let him come with me."

'Much like I'm offering to you,' Meng Yao could all but hear.

He looked down again, making eye contact with Mo Yu. Children were hardly the best judges of character, easily tricked and fooled as any adult pleased. But they were also poor liars.

(And, despite how nervous he was, Mo Yu truly did look at home in Wei Wuxian's arms. He felt safe there; assured. It was hard to tell whether they were really half brothers, as Wei Wuxian claimed, but did have a few reasons to believe it. For one, every time Mo Yu's sleeve slipped down slightly Meng Yao could see a few marks on his arm. Years-old scars, creeping into view whenever the uniform's sleeves slipped off his too-thin wrists. Mo Yu had every right to be terrified now, and had obviously lived through something difficult, but he viewed Wei Wuxian as home.)

(It might be a manipulation technique. It was entirely possible Mo Yu wasn't here because Wei Wuxian wanted to let him meet his half brother, but instead because it would help him lure in Meng Yao. It was likely, in fact, that they weren't brothers at all, and Wei Wuxian had just made that up. Meng Yao would be far from surprised if Wei Wuxian was just approaching him as part of a convoluted scheme to take the Jin down. But…

When would he ever get a chance like this again?)

"Well, I'm sure this won't be a simple decision for you," Wei Wuxian said. "I'll leave you a way to contact me-"

"No!" Meng Yao shouted at once.

Wei Wuxian just blinked: "No?"

It was risky. It was scary. But Meng Yao couldn't take the chance that Wei Wuxian would retract his offer later.

"Thank you for the offer," he said at once, bowing lowly. "I humbly accept."

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened.

And then, a moment later, he lit up.

"Did you hear that, A-Yu? You're brother's going to come with us!"

"He is?" the little boy asked, a small, hopeful smile forming on his face.

"I… I am," Meng Yao confirmed, and Mo Yu's smile got that much brighter.

"Wonderful. I have your room already prepared. How long do you expect it to take you to settle your affairs here? A month?"

"I can leave right now."

"Eh? Really?"

Well, no, not really. The Madam and boss would surely be furious if he just up and left, and he had still had his revenge to consider. It was all planned out already. He would only need a week to implement it fully, but…

Wei Wuxian already admitted he didn't fully trust Meng Yao. Half of this job was a test of character, to see what kind of a person Meng Yao was. For all Meng Yao knew, the test had already begun.

(And, if Meng Yao had to choose, the opportunity he was being presented now was worth just a little bit more to him than the revenge. He had only been in this shop, piling up grievances, for two months. The people here didn't matter to him.)

He looked down one more time at Mo Yu, happy, safe, and content in Wei Wuxian's arms.

"Yes, I'm sure," he confirmed. "Thank you again, Wei-gongzi."

And Wei Wuxian smiled back.

"I look forward to seeing what you do."

Despite the rather climactic conclusion Jin Zixuan's confession made to the last segment, there was very little for the watchers to talk about once it was over. For one, they had actually missed most of the segment due to the activation of the concealment zone, and thus had much less content to consider than usual. For another, very little had happened. It truly did feel like set-up in the same way the Cloud Recesses disciple exchange did.

(Except, this time around, the watchers had a far more broad perspective. Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue were especially quiet, unable to shake the feeling that whatever was coming would seem extremely obvious in hindsight.)

Lan Wangji was most silent of all, the weight of what his other self had done in the last segment looming over him heavily. Every time he made a sound, Jin Guangshan would glance back at him, a knowing smile on his face. Subconsciously, Lan Wangji had become quieter and quieter in an effort to avoid this, erasing his presence almost entirely.

Luckily, given that no one was talking, there were no conversations that had to stop when the simulation began anew. Everything faded to darkness and Lan Sizhui's voice rang out.

"Two months later."

An abandoned city appeared. It was worn down, with untended roads and crumbling buildings. It was also familiar.

Wen Qing's eyes widened.

"Qishan?" she whispered.

Wen Ruohan's gaze turned ice cold.

"After the Qishan Wen Sect collapsed, the city that used to be the most prosperous of all evaporated into thin air in just one night, leaving nothing but ruins. People who had lived there searched for new homes, and Lanling, Yunmeng, Gusu, and Qinghe received the greatest influx of residents out of all of them."

Because Wen Ruohan had lost.

No, rather, because he had decided to start this all in the first place.

"As a result, those four cities began to flourish," Lan Sizhui finished, tone completely blank. It was as though he was reciting the statistics of a hypothetical event rather than a real one.

Meanwhile, the simulation changed to suit the narration, moving away from the wastelands that were once Qishan to an even more prosperous version of Yunmeng than the one in their world.

"Ah, Hanguang-jun," someone realized, bowing at once upon recognizing the white robed cultivator. Lan Wangji bowed back to everyone who greeted him, so practiced in this that he was able to continue moving forward without the slightest change in pace. At least, at first.

"Lan Zhan — ah, no, Hanguang-jun. What a coincidence!" Wei Wuxian said, looking over from where he was seated on the other side of the street. The airy pavilion he was in had gauze curtains on all sides, shading the open air dining area from the hot afternoon sun. The trend from the flashback in the last segment continued: contrary to the bustling street, there was a notable lack of people in the area around Wei Wuxian.

Except, of course, the quartet of girls.

Seeing them, the cultivators that had flocked to Hanguang-jun like bees to flowers suddenly gained awkward expressions. They began backing away uncomfortably.

'Ah, Hanguang-jun and Wei Wuxian have a terrible relationship, don't they? I… probably shouldn't stay here.'

'I heard these two got into arguments every time they met up during the sunshot campaign.'

Nie Huaisang couldn't help but cackle at that: "What ignorant souls!"

"You're right," Jin Guangshan said, then, glancing back at Lan Wangji, continued, "They don't have even the slightest idea what the true relationship between those two is, do they?"

Lan Wangji didn't flinch or look away at his words. That didn't mean he didn't want to.

While that conversation had occurred, the concerns of the surrounding cultivators had climaxed. The general public seemed sure Hanguang-jun would storm off as soon as possible rather than converse with Wei Wuxian.

However, instead, Lan Wangji simply commented, "It's you."

"It's me!" Wei Wuxian confirmed. "Hey, when did you find the time to come to Yunmeng? If you're not busy, why don't you come over here and have a drink?"

The girls at his sides all circled him, laughing, "Yeah, young master. Come up here and have a drink!"

Both the watchers and the surrounding cultivators turned to stare intently at Hanguang-jun, waiting to see his reaction. There was a slow breath in, then a slow breath out.

The next thing the simulation showed was him entering the open-air pavilion Wei Wuxian was inside.

'What are you doing?' Lan Wangji thought, watching his other self with a wary gaze. 'You… don't you remember what you did to him? Do you really think you can just approach him like this after what happened?!'

Lan Wangji didn't want to stay away from Wei Wuxian forever. The future had more than shown how many times Hanguang-jun had been able to help Wei Wuxian and keep him safe. That was a good thing.

(And, given what Wei Wuxian had done while they were both drunk, his feelings were most certainly not unreciprocated.)

But that didn't change the fact that watching his future self approaching Wei Wuxian made the real Lan Wangji very, very uncomfortable.

"Sit, sit," Wei Wuxian offered, gesturing to an empty seat before him. "If you're here, won't you have a few sips?"

"Liquor is prohibited."

"I know liquor is prohibited in your sect, but it's not like this is the Cloud Recesses. It's fine to have a few sips here."

Lan Wangji's expression didn't relax at all, clearly indicating his disapproval.

"Your far-future self seems to disagree," Lan Xichen coyly pointed out. Those words made Lan Qiren grit his teeth together, annoyed at the reminder of how unexpectedly his most precious student had turned out, but he held the complaint in.

Wei Wuxian was important to Lan Wangji, and the two of them drinking together had allowed their relationship to grow closer. He still didn't like it, especially when he was forced to watch, but he couldn't completely oppose it either. Perhaps it would be okay to allow a lack of control every once in a while.

Despite that, the ghost girls filled a cup of alcohol for him and placed it on his side of the table. He didn't reach for the cup, but he didn't move to leave either.

"You finally came to Yunmeng for once, and you won't even try the delicious liquor here?" Wei Wuxian protested playfully. "Well, though this liquor is delicious, I suppose it can't hope to compare to Gusu's Emperor's Smile! That's really the best alcohol of all. If I ever go to Gusu again, I'll definitely grab a half dozen and drink them all at once!"

Jiang Cheng blanched at the description, unable to resist imagining the hangover that would lead to the next day.

"Honestly, what's wrong with you? There's a seat right there and you're still standing! Sit, won't you?"

"Go sit! Go sit!" the girls agreed, motioning for him to sit down.

Lan Wangji's light eyes examined the girls slowly. Then his gaze turned to the flute by Wei Wuxian's side.

After considering his words carefully, he opened his mouth.

"You should not stay in the company of inhuman beings for so long."

There was a beat of silence and a gust of wind moved the gauze curtains forward until they blocked out the sun. In the new dimness, a faint red glow could be seen emanating from the eyes of the girls and Wei Wuxian.

Several watchers couldn't help but swallow nervously at the sight.

Jin Zixuan gave an awkward laugh: "Ah… after watching Wen Ning for so long… it's hard to remember what ghosts are usually like."

"We also saw these girls in the last segment," Madam Jin pointed out. "Wei Wuxian had made them seem awfully human then, too."

Had made them seem alive, just like Wen Ning appeared, even while being a walking corpse.

But now the girls stood almost impossibly still, staring, unblinking, at Lan Wangji. The darkness also made their bodies seem paler than before, as if there was no blood moving in them.

(Admittedly, there probably wasn't.)

Wei Wuxian lifted his hand, and his eyes glowed a brighter red for a moment. A command was sent out through the surrounding resentful energy.

The girls stepped back, out of sight.

And, unconsciously, a few of the watchers did as well.

"Lan Zhan…" Wei Wuxian shook his head. "You really do become more boring the older you get."

Once again, Lan Wangji barely withstood the urge to flinch.

"You're still so young. It's not like you're in your seventies; don't go around copying your uncle all the time."

Lan Qiren, on the other hand, could not quite hold back his reaction. He felt his fists clench and looked down, unable to watch Wei Wuxian even a moment longer.

“You should focus on things other than scolding others sometimes.”

Stepping around the table, Lan Wangji walked slightly closer and said, “Wei Ying, it would be for the best if you came to Gusu with me.”

“That again?!” Jiang Cheng snapped.

Jiang Yanli frowned slightly, and Lan Xichen looked down.

“...I haven’t heard you say that in a long time,” Wei Wuxian commented.

There was a far more serious air over this conversation than the last one they’d had. Several watchers felt themselves tense and couldn’t quite tell if that was in response to the current scene or Wei Wuxian’s emotions, as transmitted by the surrounding resentment.

Wei Wuxian rubbed his eyes briefly, commenting, “The Sunshot Campaign is over, now. I thought you gave up on this a while ago.”

“Last time we saw each other, during the hunt on Phoenix Mountain… did you notice the signs?”

“Signs of what?” Wei Wuxian snapped.

“Your loss of control.”

There was a scoff: “You mean me getting into a fight with Jin Zixuan? I think you’re misunderstanding something; I get into a fight with him whenever I see him.”

Jin Zixuan flinched at that description.

(This wasn’t quite the “senior Wei” version of Wei Wuxian, but it was close enough to leave Jin Zixuan with a feeling of intense guilt for disappointing him. Which was strange, considering this Wei Wuxian was describing one of his peers to Lan Wangji rather than a student.)

But Lan Wangji wasn’t convinced.

“What did I say? I say so much everyday. I’ve long since forgotten some words I uttered two months ago,” he explained, making a dismissive motion with his hand.

But Lan Wangji just kept standing there, not breaking eye contact. Another cooling breeze, which should have seemed refreshing on such a hot day, brushed by, instead bringing a sense of further discomfort.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji said, “The ghostly path harms the body and the heart-”

“Oh gods,” Wei Wuxian groaned, leaning forward to rub between his brows as if he had a headache. He shook his head a few times, as though berating himself for having expected anything else.

Madam Jin sighed lightly, commenting, “I think I understand now why Wei Wuxian was so quick to leave when he ran into you the first time after being brought back to life.”

Nie Mingjue sighed as well, adding, “It’s not like I can’t see where Hanguang-jun is coming from. But this isn’t going to convince him.”

Not disagreeing, Lan Qiren felt his fists clench together even tighter than before.

This wasn’t going to get Wei Wuxian to agree to go with Lan Wangji.

‘Which might be all for the best,’ the real Lan Wangji thought, watching the simulation with a terrifyingly blank gaze.

Wei Wuxian breathed out calmingly.

“Lan Zhan, you… I’ve heard more than enough of what you have to say, but you still think you haven’t said enough? You say it harms the body, but I’m fine now. You say it harms the heart, but I haven’t become mad, have I?”

“Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian shouted, standing up. A large blast of wind flew through, shaking the building and sending the surrounding curtains flying wildly. It was the middle of a bright, sunny day, and yet no one could deny that it felt like there was a dark cloud hanging over the city.

But-

“Do you think… do you think A-Xuan’s death was because of something like this?” Madam Jin couldn’t help but ask. “I don’t deny that Wei Wuxian usually has impeccable control, but if someone kept pressuring him… maybe he’s easier to drive to madness than everyone else expects.”

At those words, Nie Mingjue could feel a number of gazes turn toward him.

(After all, even his ‘acceptable cultivation style’ worked that way. Why couldn’t Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation do the same?)

“Well… I certainly can’t imagine Wei Wuxian ever hurting A-Li if he’s sane,” Madam Yu admitted, stepping closer to her daughter once again.

But, unlike the helplessness that seemed to be sweeping over the watchers, fury appeared to be building up in the ghost girls. Their eyes glowed a brighter red and their crimson-painted lips split open into horrifyingly wide smiles. They moved up, practically looming over Lan Wangji.

The real one took a step back, watching fury flash across Wei Wuxian's face.

But-

"Stop it," Wei Wuxian commanded.

The girls didn't allow their gazes to drift from Lan Wangji's impassive form, but slowly retreated nonetheless.

(Despite everything, his control was still perfect.)

"Well, what can I say?" Wei Wuxian laughed once. "Even though I don't think I'll regret it, I don't like to listen to other people's guesses on how I'll feel in the future either."

"I know, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered. "But… maybe because of that… you won't be alive for much longer."

With how relaxed most of the previous segment was, it was easy to temporarily forget about that.

(Not too long from now, Wei Wuxian would kill Jin Zixuan, Jiang Yanli, and supposedly thousands of other cultivators. Not too long after, Jiang Cheng would lead a siege against him and he would die.)

(Coming back to life didn't negate that. Not at all.)

Finally-

"No." Lan Wangji's bright eyes seemed to dim further. "...I was the one out of line."

"You weren't. But, indeed, it seems like I shouldn't have invited you up here. I was presumptuous."

"You weren't."

"Really?" Wei Wuxian asked, voice notably blank. "That's good then."

A few more beats of silence followed.

Lan Qiren couldn't believe he was thinking this, but he missed watching his nephew and Wei Wuxian drunk-flirting with each other in front of the juniors. Hanguang-jun had tied his forehead ribbon around Wei Wuxian and had nearly caused Lan Qiren to have a heart attack when he had seen. That was still vastly preferable to this.

Lifting the alcohol jar up, Wei Wuxian downed it immediately.

"Still, I guess I should thank you," Wei Wuxian said. "I'll take that as you being concerned for me."

And that was what it was. The watchers all knew that.

But Wei Wuxian clearly didn't.

(Their first night together after Wei Wuxian came back to life, when Hanguang-jun physically dragged him back to the Cloud Recesses, felt different now.)

"Then, I won't take up any more of Hanguang-jun's time," Wei Wuxian offered. "Let's meet again if the chance comes up."

Not even bothering to wait for a response, Wei Wuxian left. His ghost girls followed after, still watching Lan Wangji with their unnerving glares.

The world turned dark for a moment. When light returned, they were in Lotus Pier.

"Ah, that was beyond awkward," Nie Huaisang groaned, burying his face in his hands.

"S… sorry we watched that," Jin Zixuan said, glancing tentatively over at Lan Wangji. He and Jiang Yanli might have been misunderstanding each other, and Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan might have behaved coldly toward each other at various times, but it was most certainly nothing like this.

However…

"You have nothing to apologize for," Lan Wangji responded. "This is all… because of…"

'Me,' he couldn't quite bring himself to say.

Wei Wuxian stepped into one of the main buildings, and Jiang Cheng looked up from where he was wiping his sword.

"You're back?" he asked.

"I'm back."

Jiang Cheng frowned: "You look terrible. Don't tell me you ran into Jin Zixuan."

"Worse than Jin Zixuan."

Jiang Yanli winced slightly at that description, and both the real Jin Zixuan and real Lan Wangji desperately wished they could melt into the floor.

"Who did you run into then?"

"Guess."

"Hmm… give me a hint."

Without hesitating for a second, Wei Wuxian added, "Wants to lock me up."

"Lan Wangji?" Jiang Cheng responded at once, having needed no time to ponder.

"...You also think Lan Wangji wants to lock Wei Wuxian up?" Madam Yu asked, glancing back at her son. He floundered for a moment, but found he could only shrug helplessly.

"He was there the day Wei Wuxian returned from the Burial Mounds," Jin Guangshan pointed out. "With how… unexpressive Lan-er-gongzi is, it's not much of a surprise that no one managed to figure out his true intentions."

Turned away, Lan Xichen was unable to notice the way Lan Wangji stopped breathing completely at those words.

"Why was he in Yunmeng?"

"No idea," Wei Wuxian shrugged. "He was in the streets, probably searching for someone. He hasn't brought this topic up since the sunshot campaign, but today he was at it again."

"It's your fault for calling him over first."

Wei Wuxian did a double take: "How did you know I called him over?"

"Do you even have to ask? When have you not been the one to initiate contact between the two of you? You're strange too. You always part on bad terms. Why do you keep trying to talk with him?"

"Because I'm ridiculous," Wei Wuxian declared.

"Because you love him!" Nie Huaisang shouted back. Jiang Cheng frowned at those words, but couldn't dispute them.

(Not after he'd seen first hand how happy Wei Wuxian was when he and Lan Wangji were together.)

But this Jiang Cheng had nowhere near the same amount of information the watchers did. He sighed, muttered an "at least you're aware of that," and went back to wiping his sword.

Wei Wuxian collapsed dramatically into a seat across from Jiang Cheng before asking, "Just how many times do you have to wipe your sword every day?"

"Three times. And what about you? When was the last time you even held your sword?"

Wei Wuxian grabbed a pear and took a bite.

"I wipe it once a month," he responded. "I know where it is; I tossed it in my room. I don't need to take care of it more often than that."

Madam Yu sighed: "Well, if he refuses to bring it even to conferences, I suppose this is no surprise."

Those words made Jiang Yanli frown, however, and she pointed out, “But… A-Xian loves practicing his swordsmanship.”

“Maybe he doesn’t think he needs to now that he has demonic cultivation,” Jiang Cheng pointed out. “If he can take on a few thousand spiritual cultivators at once, it probably seems pretty pointless.”

‘Huh? You think those cultivators will be interested in Yunmeng? I don’t think so. To put it simply, they’re interested in Wei Wuxian, aren’t they? Didn’t the Yunmeng Jiang Sect grow in renown during the Sunshot Campaign only because of Wei Wuxian?’

“Still, that’s… a pretty stark change,” Lan Xichen commented. “I’m sure everyone can see how different he is now. I can’t imagine that’s helping his public image much.”

Giving a teasing laugh, Jin Zixuan leaned over to Jiang Cheng and commented, “You, on the other hand, seem to be taking care of your sword a bit excessively.”

Jiang Cheng jumped, recognizing immediately this was revenge for the numerous ‘peacock’ comments he and Wei Wuxian had given.

“You’re right,” Wen Ruohan acknowledged, his lips twitching up into a mocking smirk. “It’s quite lucky, then, that Wei Wuxian managed to return Jiang Wanyin’s core to him, isn’t it?”

Quite a few watchers jumped at that. They hadn’t forgotten per-se, but so much had happened since then that it was hard to keep track of every little thing.

(Nie Huaisang and Wen Qing, who had most certainly not forgotten that detail, felt their expressions fall at the comment.)

While that conversation had been going on, the simulated Jiang Cheng had expressed his disapproval: “From now on, carry your sword to important events like hunts and discussion conferences. When you don’t, it’s a blatant showing of your lack of discipline for others to laugh at.”

“You know I hate it when other people try to force me into doing things. The more they try to make me do it, the less I want to do it. So what if I’m not carrying my sword? What are they going to do about it? And I don’t want to be dragged into a sword duel by people I don’t even know. So I just won’t take it. Solves everything. It’s better this way.”

That was the kind of thoughtless refusal Lan Qiren would expect a disgruntled preteen to give their friends. Sure, Wei Wuxian had gone against Lan Qiren’s authority before and disobeyed common courtesy before and gotten into fights and invented demonic cultivation, but…

There had always been a reason for it.

(And ‘I don’t want to waste my time fighting nobodies’ didn’t seem to match the kind of motivations Wei Wuxian had shown in the past.)

Jiang Cheng seemed to agree slightly, asking, “Didn’t you love showing off your sword skills in front of others?”

Which wasn’t too far off from what Jiang Yanli had said. People perked up in interest.

“I was a kid then. I can’t act like a kid forever, now can I?”

There wasn’t much people could do other than shrug. It didn’t seem like a motive that made much sense, but what reason would Wei Wuxian have to lie to Jiang Cheng?

If Lan Wangji wasn’t still trying to avoid Jin Guangshan’s attention as much as possible, he might have noticed the somewhat bitter amusement that crossed Wen Ruohan, Wen Qing, and Nie Huaisang’s faces at that.

Jiang Cheng smirked, shaking his head in an entertained disbelief as he concluded, “Fine, don’t bring your sword then. It doesn’t matter. But don’t provoke Jin Zixuan from now on. He’s Jin Guangshan’s only son, after all. The future Sect Leader of LanlingJin will be him.”

A rather awkward silence spread out.

“If you beat him up, what am I supposed to do? As the sect leader, should I beat him up with you? Or punish you?”

“...It depends on the situation,” Lan Qiren said. “There’s more at play in one of their arguments than just their positions.”

“Ah, yes, sir,” Jiang Cheng said at once.

Lan Xichen frowned however and Nie Mingjue scowled deeply. Yes, that was how it should be, but was that how it would actually happen?

As the simulation went on, their answers were becoming more and more a firm 'no.'

However, the watchers weren’t the only ones to catch the slight error in Jiang Cheng’s words.

“What do you mean Jin Zixuan’s his only son? Isn’t Jin Guangyao here now? Jin Guangyao seems so much better than him.”

Finished with wiping his sword, Jiang Cheng slipped Sandu back in its sheath as he said, “So what if he’s better? No matter how much better he is, no matter how clever, he’ll never be anything more than a servant who greets guests. He can’t compare with Jin Zixuan.”

“I… what?” Jin Zixuan asked.

Jiang Cheng flushed red at that, but paused when Jin Guangshan said, "Young Master Jiang has a point, doesn't he? Jin Guangyao might be clever, but his true nature has been revealed to us time and time again. A-Xuan is definitely the only option there is."

Having gotten his words supported by a sect leader, Jiang Cheng relaxed slightly.

But his simulated self's comment was clearly a reference to Jin Guangyao's mother's occupation, rather than any moral values he may or may not have. It was exactly the kind of mindset that had allowed so many people to gang up against Wei Wuxian just two in-simulation months ago.

Unfortunately, the three most likely to comment on that hypocrisy were Nie Mingjue, Lan Wangji, and Wen Ruohan. One of the trio was in the middle of reassessing everything he knew about himself, and the other two had watched themselves be killed by the person in question.

Put simply, none of them were in the right headspace to try speaking in Jin Guangyao's defense at this time.

And Wei Wuxian didn't seem especially worried about that either, as an apparently far-more important issue had just been raised.

"Jiang Cheng, be honest with me — what do you mean? At Phoenix Mountain you went as far as to bring Shijie with us. You can't actually want Shijie to…"

"...It's not impossible."

"It's not impossible?! Have you forgotten what he did in Langya? You're seriously telling me that it's not impossible?!"

That was… really not how Jin Zixuan wanted one of his fiance's most precious people to react to the possibility of their marriage.

"He's… probably regretting it."

And that was really really not what Jin Zixuan wanted the best defense Jiang Cheng could give to be. He was regretting it, and he knew his other self almost certainly was too, but Jiang Yanli was worth more than that.

Wei Wuxian agreed: "Who cares if he regrets it? Do we have to forgive him just because he apologized? Look at what his dad's like! Maybe Jin Zixuan will be the same in the future!"

Jin Guangshan blinked in surprise at the vitriol Wei Wuxian was giving out, and Jin Zixuan froze in place.

"He better not be," Madam Jin hissed.

And the real Madam Jin's frown deepened as Wei Wuxian continued, "What if Jin Zixuan grows up into someone who spends all his time searching for new women? And you want Shijie to be with him?"

"See if he dares!" Jiang Cheng snarled back.

"I-I wouldn't!" Jin Zixuan shouted, turning toward Jiang Yanli. "I wouldn't! You have to believe me, I would never… I would never…"

'Be like my father' he thought, glancing back at the watching Jin Guangshan.

Sure, he wanted to be like his father, but just… not in this way.

"I… you don't think Wei Wuxian kills me because of this, do you?"

At that question, quite a few watchers had to do a double take. This whole time they had been looking for things that might corrupt Wei Wuxian until he was willing to do that. A change in Jin Zixuan being the cause had not been discussed much as of yet.

"...Probably not," Lan Wangji said at last. "His future self clearly regrets what he did. In addition, I think learning you did that would make him extremely mad, but he wouldn't kill you over it."

"...I guess so," Jin Zixuan agreed.

But now that it had been spoken out loud, the thought was most certainly there.

At that moment, Jiang Cheng sighed.

"It's not like you have a say in whether he's forgiven or not. A-Jie likes him, so what can we do?"

Wei Wuxian gritted his teeth: "Why does she have to like such a…"

He tossed the pear away, not finishing that sentence. He agreed; it was Jiang Yanli's decision. He was still unhappy about it though.

"Where's Shijie?" he asked at last.

"I don't know. Probably the usual places — the kitchen, the bedroom, or the ancestral hall. Where else would she go?"

Nodding in agreement, Wei Wuxian stood up and began to walk. The simulation flashed forward to show him in the kitchen, then, not finding her there, her bedroom, and finally the ancestral hall.

She kneeled there, cleaning her parent's memorial tablets.

Jiang Cheng, Jiang Yanli, and Madam Yu jumped at that, feeling as though they had been slapped in the face by the sudden reminder. The simulated Jiang Yanli's steady, practiced wipes nailed the point in even harder.

At the very least, they could take some solace in the fact that there were ashes in those jars.

"Your brother…" Nie Mingjue paused, clearing his throat. "Your brother was very brave, Wen-guniang."

Wen Qing paused at that, then gave a small smile and nodded in agreement. She didn't know where Wen Ning was, but she couldn't regret the actions he had taken to help the Jiangs.

(The Jiangs, meanwhile, had to look over at the memorial hall again, considering briefly what would be in it if Wen Ning hadn't managed to retrieve those for them.)

"Shijie?" Wei Wuxian asked at last. "Are you talking to Uncle Jiang and Madam Yu again?"

Voice soft as snow, Jiang Yanli responded, "Neither of you come, so of course I have to."

'Neither of you come.' Jiang Cheng was Jiang Fengmian and Yu Ziyuan's son, so of course he would be expected to come. But Wei Wuxian… had never even been adopted into the family.

~~Because Madam Yu would never let that happen.~~

When Jiang Yanli declared Wei Wuxian as her brother in front of all those Sect Leaders, Madam Yu had thought it was partially an exaggeration intended to get them to back off. However, with what she had said now….

For as long as Madam Yu could remember, the real Jiang Yanli had never referred to Wei Wuxian as anything more than her shidi.

(But now that she looked back on it, Madam Yu could see that the reason for that was probably because of her.)

Wei Wuxian knelt by Jiang Yanli's side. He grabbed Jiang Fengmian's tablet, and began cleaning them with her. As he did, however, his eyes kept straying from his work and moving over to her again.

"A-Xian, why are you looking at me like that? Is there something you'd like to tell me?"

Wei Wuxian grinned and shook his head: "No, I'm just here to roll around."

As he said that, he carefully laid Jiang Fengmian's tablet down and then literally rolled around Jiang Yanli for a bit, making her laugh in delight.

"Ah, A-Xian, you were born with a smiling face," she said. "Always smiling, never minding sorrowful things. No matter what situation you're in, you can always be happy."

She put her hands on top of his.

"It's that temperament that allows you to stand A-Cheng's bad temper."

“Hey!” Jiang Cheng protested, blushing in embarrassment as the other juniors laughed.

“Shijie, I don’t have a good temper at all,” he protested. “It’s actually all because of you. If not for you, I would have been beaten to death a hundred times by Jiang Cheng!”

How fitting, then, that once Jiang Yanli was dead, the future’s Jiang Cheng was going around torturing people who resembled Wei Wuxian. Although no one spoke that thought aloud, the cheer in the juniors slowly began to vanish.

“Silly you,” Jiang Yanli scolded. “Don’t you mind how A-Cheng acts. In his heart, he cares about you very much.”

And that was definitely true.

At one point in time.

“Xianxian, how old are you?” Jiang Yanli suddenly asked.

Perking up at once, Wei Wuxian declared, “Xianxian is three!”

“The mighty and terrifying Yiling Patriarch, everyone,” Nie Mingjue muttered, then closed his eyes and let out a sigh.

Jiang Yanli gave a sad, nostalgic smile. She wasn’t quite sure why. This Wei Wuxian hadn’t died yet, and the world hadn’t yet turned against him. Realistically speaking, this was much better than what was going to come. There was no reason for her to feel like this.

And yet the played-up innocence in Wei Wuxian’s tone still made her feel like crying.

“Shijie, I want to ask you something,” Wei Wuxian said at last. Pausing in her laughter, Jiang Yanli set Madam Yu’s memorial tablet down as well, giving Wei Wuxian her full attention.

The real Jiang Yanli tilted her head, waiting for the question.

“Why are you asking about this?” Jiang Yanli asked in response. “Do you have someone you like? What kind of a maiden is she?”

‘If she were a maiden, this would be so much simpler,’ Jiang Cheng thought, a scowl forming on his face momentarily. ‘But… Wei Wuxian’s never smiled around anyone… the way he does around Lan Wangji.’

And that wasn’t really something Wei Wuxian could choose to change about himself, so-

In direct contrast to Jiang Cheng’s thoughts, Wei Wuxian just shook his head at her question: “No. I won’t like anyone, at least not too much. I don’t see why I should. Isn’t that the same thing as putting a collar around my neck?”

“What?” Madam Jin asked. “Why would he think that?”

A snort escaped Nie Huaisang at that question and his attempt to cover it up with a cough failed rather spectacularly. Everyone turned toward him and he looked away. Although some wanted to ask what he thought was so funny, most had a fairly good idea already.

‘You don’t have to look any further than this crowd to understand Wei-xiong’s reaction. Aren’t the relationships he knows the most about Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian’s, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan’s, and Madam Jin and Jin Guangshan’s? With that as your benchmark, it really will seem like romantic relationships only bring suffering.’

However, it was hard to tell what the simulated Jiang Yanli thought about that as her only response was, “Hmm… three seems a bit old. How about one?”

She booped his nose, and he gave a big gasp.

“No! I’m three! The three year old Xianxian is hungry! What should he do?” Wei Wuxian responded, working hard to keep himself from smiling as he spoke.

After thinking for a moment, Jiang Yanli responded, “I think there’s soup in the kitchen. You can have some. Will the one year old Xianxian be able to reach the stove though?”

“If I can’t, Shijie can just pick me up. I’ll be able to reach it then!”

“Fooling around again!” Jiang Cheng suddenly shouted, stepping into the ancestral hall at that exact moment. “I, your Sect Leader, have already poured you a bowl and put it outside. Kneel before me to express your gratitude and go drink your soup outside!”

“A-Cheng!” Jiang Yanli laughed openly, making Jiang Cheng blush and try to hide his face.

Wei Wuxian, who had slipped outside to grab his soup, suddenly popped back inside: “What do you mean by this, Jiang Cheng? Where’s the meat?!”

Straightening himself up in mock-anger, Wei Wuxian elbowed Jiang Cheng and said, “Spit it out! Right now!”

“No objections here! What, do you plan on eating it then?”

“Okay, okay,” Jiang Yanli intervened. “How old are you two, fighting over some meat. I’ll just make another jar.”

Jiang Yanli smiled at the interactions the simulated three shared, but felt her smile dim a moment later. Wei Wuxian had asked her a question. In a joking manner, of course, which had led to Jiang Yanli’s equally playful response. Still, having seen his interaction with Lan Wangji (and knowing what their relationship would become in the future), she felt that the question he had asked was a little more serious than her simulated self realized.

Wei Wuxian would turn to her — trusted her — as though she was his mother.

And yet, despite her best intentions, Jiang Yanli couldn't help but feel like she never quite managed to do enough.

(After all, despite what she had said, she had neither changed Jin Zixun's mind nor gotten him to apologize to Wei Wuxian. She had just temporarily kept a fight from occurring, stalling the conflict like always.)

(Which, mind you, was more than anyone else managed to do, but Jiang Yanli's thoughts weren't very focused on that.)

Someone cleared their throat.

"My… my mother cooked Wei Wuxian's favorite dish in the world: lotus and pork rib soup," Jin Ling announced, then cleared his throat again, sounding slightly choked up. "It was… um, not only was it really delicious, but every time he had it Wei Wuxian would recall the first time he had tasted it."

The simulation showed images quickly, reminding them of the scenes they'd already watched regarding Little Love, Princess, and Jasmine meeting Wei Wuxian for the first time.

'Coward,' the five year old Jiang Cheng huffed. 'What's there to be afraid of? Look at how cute they are! They won't bite you.'

Jiang Cheng swallowed and looked away.

(After all, later, the future Jiang Wanyin would use a dog against Wei Wuxian fully intending for that dog to bite. It wouldn't be much of a threat otherwise.)

Then the young, preteen Jiang Yanli appeared, giving a warm smile like always.

'You can come down,' she said. 'Let's go back.'

When Wei Wuxian finally fell, she tried to catch him but didn't quite manage to. He slammed hard against the ground and began to cry.

Because she was never quite strong enough to actually provide any real help, was she?

And then finally, after running into Jiang Cheng, they began walking back.

'Don't worry, I won't tell Uncle Jiang,' the young Wei Wuxian promised with a wink. 'I just hurt myself since I suddenly wanted to climb a tree last night!'

Wen Ruohan frowned at those words, but made no outward comment.

Then, Jiang Yanli gave them some soup.

“Remembering that always made him happy,” Jin Ling revealed. “That’s why… mom’s soup was his favorite.”

Upon hearing that, Jin Zixuan spun towards Jiang Yanli at once.

“A-Li!”

“Y-yes?”

“I… I don’t want to volunteer you for anything or to make you do something you don’t want to, and-and I would appreciate getting to try some myself, in this world, but… do you think we’d be able to have you give instructions to someone in the future’s world? Maybe this A-Ling can still try your soup, even if you can’t be physically present to make it.”

Upon hearing that suggestion, Jiang Yanli’s eyes widened and an enormous smile appeared on her face.

“Yes!” she said at once, turning toward her fiance with some of the most enthusiasm he had ever seen from her. “Yes, let’s do it.”

At that moment, they returned to the Yiling Patriarch version of Wei Wuxian, who held his now-empty soup bowl in his hands as he gazed out at the starry sky.

‘Seeing Lan Zhan in the streets made me think about those days in the Cloud Recesses,’ he mused. ‘I called him over on a whim… I guess I thought maybe I could direct our conversation toward those times. But… I guess things are different now than they were back then.’

Lan Qiren and Lan Wangji paused at those words, wishing they could refute them. Things weren’t really all that different. Wei Wuxian was still Wei Wuxian, and his anger at the ways other people were treating him didn’t change that. But their future selves — all of their future selves, from Jiang Wanyin to Jin Guangshan — didn’t seem to realize that. Things were different than they were before only because they insisted on making it so.

Jiang Yanli’s future self seemed to be the only one who disagreed.

At that moment, Wei Wuxian stood up. He began to walk, passing through the Jiang Sect’s training grounds on the way. The disciples all bowed their heads, their gazes containing respect, acknowledgement, and a little bit of fear.

‘I… don’t recognize any of them,’ Wei Wuxian thought absent-mindedly as he passed through. A brief flash of a memory was shown. The past Wei Wuxian, at fifteen, playing casually with his fellow disciples, getting teased and laughed at and splashed and hugged as they went about their lives.

“He doesn’t recognize any of them?” Madam Yu asked, her frown deepening. “Even if… even after what happened, I would have thought he would continue teaching his juniors. Wasn’t he always running around doing that?”

“Our Wei Wuxian still does that,” Jiang Cheng confirmed.

But for some reason, after developing demonic cultivation, it seemed like Wei Wuxian wanted nothing to do with his sword anymore.

Nie Huaisang, Wen Qing, and Wen Ruohan all glanced at each other briefly, accidentally making eye contact (which Nie Huaisang hurriedly looked away from with a terrified ‘eep’).

Wei Wuxian exited the training grounds and even passed through Lotus Pier’s gates. Outside, despite the late hour, vendors sold all sorts of treats and trinkets, and the sizzling oil filled the air with a mouth-watering aroma. Wei Wuxian breathed in.

It was slightly different from what Jiang Cheng recalled of his home. People he didn’t know were there, and this section of the pier had clearly been rebuilt recently. Which made sense, given that five years and a war had passed, but it was still somewhat disconcerting to see.

Nevertheless, Wei Wuxian grinned. He walked over to the stall with the largest pot of sizzling oil.

“Big servings today, huh?” he asked.

The vendor grinned back fearlessly, offering, “Young Master Wei, you want one? I’ll give it to you for free. No charge!”

“I’ll have one. Change me anyways,” he offered, handing over a few coins. However, at that moment, he noticed someone else there. He glanced over at the figure sitting to the stall’s left, who was shivering as they clutched their knees. When Wei Wuxian had spoken, their head had shot up.

And, at this moment, both Wei Wuxian and the watchers realized who it was.

“You?!” he asked.

Wen Qing looked up at him.

The scene faded away.

There was silence among the watchers. The dignified, capable, untouchable doctor of the Wens had looked like a beggar just then. It was about as far as you could get from the person they all knew. Jiang Yanli covered her mouth, which was wide in shock, while Madam Jin and Madam Yu gaped openly. Then, the very air seemed to darken.

Bloodlust filled Wen Ruohan’s mind, and rage seemed to encompass Nie Mingjue. They wanted to stand up and demand that whoever had managed to turn such a capable, honorable person into that be held accountable.

Except…

One of them had started the war, and the other had led the side that won it. Who could be considered responsible for this, if not the two of them?

When light returned, Koi Tower appeared before them.

"...I hate it when they do this," Lan Xichen admitted, eyes unusually unkind. By this point, it was hard to be surprised that the simulation would cut away at the worst moment possible. Still, after what they had just seen….

"Qing-guniang, are you alright?" Jiang Yanli asked, walking over to her. That sight had been enough to leave a sour taste in everyone's mouth. Some, like Wen Ruohan, were furious at what had happened to one of their own. Some, like the Lans and Nie, were furious at the state Wen Qing, the woman who had gone against Wen Ruohan to save Wei Wuxian, was in. Some, like Jin Guangshan, were disappointed at how dirty the once-beautiful woman had become.

Regardless, no one was pleased at what they had just seen.

"I… I was alone," Wen Qing whispered. "Why… wasn't A-Ning with me?"

Those who hadn't yet considered her brother sucked in a breath at that question.

"Is he… already dead?" Wen Qing asked, staring, wide eyed, at the glistening golden tower before her.

(So opposite the appearance her other self had displayed just a moment ago.)

But, with as much indifference to their concerns as always, the simulation remained at Koi Tower, where Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji were walking through the endless sea of white peonies. They moved so gracefully they practically appeared to be gliding over them, the dewdrops on the flowers barely stirring in their wake.

The watchers forced themselves to relax, focusing on the scene before them.

Lan Xichen looked over: "Wangji, is there something on your mind? Why do you seem so tense?"

"...Tense?" Nie Huaisang asked, glancing at Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng, who could only shake their heads. They might be better at reading Lan Wangji than they were before, but they were still a long way away from Lan Xichen's skill, it seemed.

(Though even Lan Xichen seemed to have no clue why Lan Wangji had been acting so strange since the concealment zone activated during the last segment.)

Nevertheless, as Lan Wangji's brows furrowed and he shook his head, it became clear to all the watchers that Lan Xichen's read of the situation had been spot on.

Then-

"...Xiongzhang, there is someone I want to take back to the Cloud Recesses."

Lan Xichen nodded, listening carefully.

"Take him back… and hide him somewhere."

The first jade's eyes widened.

"Ah, you're speaking about Wei Wuxian, aren't you?" Madam Jin realized at once. There was a bit of laughter across the watchers, and teasing smiles formed on everyone's faces. The shock of Wen Qing was hard for them to ignore, but they were starting to get used to their helplessness before the simulation. It would be easier on everyone if they could just go with the flow.

Sighing, Lan Qiren commented, "If only Hanguang-jun maintained the level of hesitance you have."

"Come now, Uncle," Lan Xichen said. "You have to acknowledge that it worked out rather nicely."

Lan Qiren shrugged, neglecting to comment.

Their reactions were completely different from the simulated Lan Xichen's. He felt nothing but surprise.

'Ever since A-Niang passed away, Wangji became more and more withdrawn. Apart from night hunts, Wangji spends all his time in his room, reading, meditating, practicing calligraphy, playing his guqin, and improving his cultivation, only ever really talking to me.'

"Oh, that's so sad!" Nie Huaisang wailed, feeling this single-mindedness was another way Lan Wangji resembled his older brother. "Though at least that seems to change in the future. You know, with you dragging Wei-xiong back to the Cloud Recesses and all."

"Definitely," Jiang Yanli giggled. "And A-Xian was protesting so loudly too. I'm surprised Hanguang-jun managed to keep his cool."

Nodding in agreement, Lan Qiren admitted, "I suppose that if there's one thing Wangji has learned overtime, it's that the easiest way to deal with Wei Wuxian is to just keep going no matter what he says-"

"Uncle, enough!"

Everyone froze. Because Lan Wangji had just raised his voice and screamed at his uncle. And it wasn't an embarrassed protest, he sounded genuinely enraged. The closest thing they had ever heard to this was the simulated Lan Wangji yelling at Wei Wuxian after he had switched the book.

But even that was nothing compared to the sheer desperation that had been in Lan Wangji's tone just now.

~~He knew why they were saying that. It was because, when Wei Wuxian was being dragged to the Cloud Recesses, he was protesting under misinformed assumptions. It was because he sometimes liked to complain at length about things that didn't really bother him in order to be babied by the few people who would actually allow him to be that vulnerable, and, as the~~

~~simulated Wei Wuxian began to trust Hanguang-jun more, he had used that card time and time again. It was because, despite all the times Wei Wuxian nearly initiated it, Hanguang-jun had always refused to do anything uncouth with him.~~

~~But they didn't realize that his hesitance was because he had messed up so thoroughly once before.~~

"Wangji?" Lan Xichen asked, stepping closer and lowering his voice.

"No need to worry, Lan-gongzi," Jin Guangshan said. "Your brother's just having a little difficulty accepting the idea that it's okay to like beautiful things."

"I will have to request that you don't speak on my behalf, Sect Leader Jin," Lan Wangji said, tone colder than even the deepest water in the ocean.

The fact that his brother wanted to bring a person home had greatly surprised the simulated Lan Xichen. However, as the silence drew on, he quickly realized how serious Lan Wangji was being. Soon, a bit of happiness and approval appeared in his expression.

However, one thing was still confusing.

"Hide them somewhere?" Lan Xichen asked.

Lan Wangji frowned softly.

"Yes. But…" he paused, "...He is not willing."

Both Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren's smiles faded slightly at that, instantly realizing the connection to the current Sect Leader Lan. Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji might not know exactly what had happened between their parents, but…

It made sense that this would be weighing on him.

(However, Lan Wangji knew full well that this was about more than just his parents. Those words — those concerns — were, more than anything, a product of Phoenix Mountain.)

At that moment, a loud clamor was heard from the back.

"Is this a road someone like you can walk on?! Who let you roam around?!" someone shouted, the words nearly coming out as a growl.

"I'm sorry, I-"

Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen turned around and saw Jin Zixun, nose turned up high, shouting rather menacingly at a man cloaked in pure white robes. When that man noticed their gazes he immediately went pale. Clearly, he recognized them.

And the watchers recognized him.

“Su She,” Wen Qing observed blankly.

(She wished the simulation would focus on her brother. Or go back to the future, and show what happened after Wei Wuxian was stabbed. Or move between those times, and show how he died. Unsurprisingly, the simulation decided to do none of those things.)

Jin Zixun’s shouts and rants had continued without end, but, not long after, a man in golden robes walked over with swift steps. It was Jin Guangyao, donning the vermillion mark his current position allowed him to have.

“The paths of Koi Tower are rather intricate,” he commented. “Young Master Su, it’s not your fault that you got lost. You can come with me. I’ll guide you where you need to go.”

Jin Zixun sneered and stormed off, but Su She appeared rather taken aback: “You know me?”

“Of course I do. Why wouldn’t I?” Jin Guangyao smiled. “We’ve met before, haven’t we? Young Master Su, Su Minshan, your swordsmanship is quite good. Ever since the hunt at Phoenix Mountain, I was thinking that it would be a pity if such a young talent never made its way over to our sect. In the end, though, it appears you made it here without my intervention. I was over the moon with joy. Would you come this way, please?”

“He really does have a great memory,” Jiang Cheng commented.

“Yeah,” Nie Mingjue agreed. “That’s part of why I-”

He stopped, not finishing that sentence.

‘His skills are why he initially caught my attention. That’s part of why I valued him so much. And then he… and then I-’

A bitter taste filled his mouth.

Meanwhile, Su She appeared to have been completely swept up in Jin Guangyao’s flattery.

“There were countless cultivators who would come, seeking assistance from the LanlingJin Sect like Su She did,” Lan Sizhui read aloud, very pointedly not commenting on Lan Jingyi’s mocking scoff at Su She’s name. “He didn’t think anyone would recognize him, and he never expected Jin Guangyao to be able to remember him so clearly, even going as far as offering praise, after having only met him once. He was instantly relieved.”

A fact that showed rather clearly on his face. He turned away from the Lan brothers at once, not wanting to see what sorts of expressions they were making.

The scene shifted, and the LanlingJin Sect’s Glamor Hall came into view. It was bustling with people, everyone who had come for the conference seated in their appropriate spots. The positions were rather carefully chosen, and no one was surprised to see Jin Guangyao running around, managing the whole thing.

Beautiful women walked to every table, pouring glasses of alcohol for the sect leaders seated there. When they arrived at the Lan table, they noticed the lack of alcohol cups — tea cups and a few, dainty dishes being the only items there — and quickly moved on. Lan Xichen had his usual friendly smile on, while Lan Wangji became as unreadable as a brick wall. The conversation they were having earlier was not appropriate for the current time and place, so neither tried to talk.

However, at that moment, a man approached them.

"Sect Leader Lan, Hanguang-jun, a toast to both of you!" Jin Zixun said, holding his cup out.

A frown instantly appeared on Lan Qiren's face.

Jin Zixun had been going around toasting everyone, and seemed to not realize why this would make the situation uncomfortable. Jin Guangyao hurried over.

"Zixun, both Zewu-jun and Hanguang-jun grew up in the Cloud Recesses. There are over three thousand rules on their stone wall, some of which forbid drinking. Instead of asking them to join you in this, why not-"

"The Jin Sect and the Lan Sect have always been like family!" Jin Zixun declared, quite annoyed by Jin Guangyao's interruption. "We're one union! My two Lan brothers, if you don't drink this, you'll be looking down on me!"

"Zixun, you little-" Jin Zixuan cut himself off, remembering last minute that his parents were seated right next to him, and buried his face in his hands. "I can't believe you told Wei Wuxian it was 'rude' for him to win a fucking competition, and then just a few months later you…"

Jiang Yanli sent him a pitying look, but there wasn't much she could say to help,

And, worst of all, was the reaction Zixun's thoughtless words elicited.

"What a bold move."

"How confident. That's just how an esteemed cultivator should act!"

"But Wei Wuxian was being too arrogant?" Nie Mingjue asked, repeating Jin Zixuan's point.

(But of course, these same people hadn't complained at all when it had been Nie Mingjue taking a third of the prey.)

Jin Guangyao's smile appeared shaky and he rubbed at his temples to alleviate some stress. Lan Xichen stood up.

"Thank you for the offer, Young Master Jin, bu-"

“You don’t have to say anything, Sect Leader Lan! Our sects aren’t strangers. Don’t speak so formally with me! Just tell me one thing — will you drink or not?”

The corners of Jin Guangyao’s eyes began to twitch as he pointed out, “After this they’ll be flying back on their swords. Drinking would probably affect their-”

“It’s not like they’ll get drunk after just a few cups!” Jin Zixun said, clearly having never seen a Lan drink in his life. “Even if I drink eight large bowls, I’ll still be able to fly away just fine!”

Well Jin Zixuan knew for a fact that wasn’t true.

But a wave of cheers and encouragement came from all sides.

(Because while Wei Wuxian or Jin Guangyao saying the same would be a challenge to the hierarchy, Jin Zixun saying it made it an honorable and noteworthy accomplishment. Nie Huaisang not bringing his sword was just what he did. Nie Mingjue taking a third of the prey was just Da-ge being Da-ge. Madam Yu whipping Wei Wuxian over nothing was just to be expected. Jin Zixun forcing the Lans outside of their comfort zones was displaying his confidence. No one wanted to intervene.)

But then-

A hand reached forward, snatching up the cup of liquor being offered to the Lans. Lan Wangji’s eyes opened wider in surprise.

And Wei Wuxian drank the full thing in a single gulp.

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli realized, lighting up at once. She turned toward Wen Qing, who was staring at Wei Wuxian with nearly tangible levels of relief in her eyes.

Finally, they might get some answers.

With a heavy clank, Wei Wuxian set the cup down on the table.

“I drank it for him,” he said. “You satisfied yet?”

Although such thoughts weren’t appropriate given the current situation, the real Lan Wangji couldn’t help looking Wei Wuxian up and down. He had helped Lan Wangji. And the confidence in his stance, the mocking disobedience in his eyes, the playful grin on his face… combined with his striking appearance as the Yiling Patriarch, it was all quite…

Lan Wangji turned away.

(After what he had done, he had no right to look at Wei Wuxian like that ever again.)

“Young Master Wei,” Lan Xichen realized.

“When did he come in?” someone whispered, backing away from the scene. The atmosphere throughout the crowd was completely opposite the enthusiasm they had while Jin Zixun was in control.

Wei Wuxian glanced over at the speaker for a half second, responding, "Just a moment ago."

The person being addressed jumped slightly, looking very much like they wished they could hide behind their friend. After all-

'Just a moment ago?' people thought. 'But we were all here… and not a single person noticed him enter. No one notified the room or greeted him. How did he…'

The gathered cultivators shivered. For most it was an expression of their disgust and fear over his abilities.

And for some, like Jin Guangshan, in fascination and desire.

Lan Wangji's eyes remained situated on Sect Leader Jin like a rabbit watching a tiger.

The first to recover was Jin Guangyao, who rushed forward at once, all smiles, to say, "I wasn't aware Young Master Wei had arrived at Koi Tower. I apologize, the lack of welcome was my fault. Would you like to be seated? Oh, right — do you have an invitation?"

"No thanks, I don't," Wei Wuxian responded immediately, his eyes not straying from Jin Zixun all the while. "Young Master Jin, could i please have a word with you?"

"What has Zixun done now?!" Jin Zixuan cried out, beyond done with his cousin. Jiang Yanli had grown close to Wen Qing throughout the simulation, and Madam Jin had already had immense respect for her. Jin Zixuan himself had been beyond impressed to see the way she and Wen Ning had protected Wei Wuxian and Jiang Wanyin after the Massacre of Lotus Pier.

So to see her like that now-

'Zixun,' he thought, 'You better not have been involved.'

"You want to talk now?" Jin Zixun asked, scoffing at Wei Wuxian's request. "If you have anything to say, come after the banquet is over."

Some in the crowd muttered their support of him while criticizing Wei Wuxian's forcefulness. Perhaps encouraged by that, Jin Zixun sneered down at Wei Wuxian.

'He's the last person I want to talk to,' Jin Zixun thought.

"...How long would I have to wait?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Probably around six to eight hours. Or maybe ten to twelve. Or until tomorrow."

"So that's a 'no' to talking then," Madam Jin said.

"I'm afraid I can't wait that long," Wei Wuxian said.

“You’ll have to wait even if you can’t.”

“Wei Wuxian’s clearly trying to solve this matter quietly,” Nie Mingjue signed. “But with Jin Zixun… that’s not likely to work.”

“Yeah, I’m gonna go with a strong ‘no’ on that front,” Jiang Cheng muttered, glaring at the Jin disciple.

At that moment, Jin Guangyao stepped in and asked, “Young Master, what do you need Zixun for? Is it really such a pressing matter?”

“Pressing indeed. It allows for no delay.”

And thus, in response, Jin Zixun turned to Lan Xichen and said, “Sect Leader Lan, here, here. You haven’t joined my toast yet!”

“Zixun!” Madam Jin snapped.

“Is he… trying to parody what happened in the last segment — how Wei Wuxian turned to Lan Wangji and thanked him for his help while in the middle of a conversation with him?” Madam Yu wondered, and, despite her annoyance at Jin Zixun, long-born habit had her continue with, “See Wei Wuxian? This is exactly what happens when you get into fights with people over nothing!”

“And who among us would have behaved differently when confronted with the same situation?” Nie Mingjue pointed out. “I’m sure he could have bent over backwards to placate them back then and maybe that would be helpful now. But he shouldn’t have to.”

(Just like Nie Mingjue felt, once upon a time, that Meng Yao shouldn’t have to.)

And whatever was worrying Wei Wuxian was too important to allow for this stalling any longer.

“Fine. Then I’ll talk about it right here. Young Master Jin, have you heard of someone by the name of Wen Ning?”

Wen Qing nearly did a double take, and she felt her mind momentarily freeze.

“Wen Ning? I haven’t.”

“I’m sure you remember him,” Wei Wuxian countered. “Last month, when you were night hunting in Guangquan, you chased an eight winged bat king to the gathering place, or the detention camp, that the remnants of the Wen Sect lived inside. You brought out a group of Wen disciples. The one in the lead was him.”

Slowly, quietly, narration from Lan Sizhui began to play: “After the Sunshot Campaign, the Qishan Wen Sect was destroyed. The territory was split up among the winning sects. The Guanquan area was appropriated by the LanlingJin Sect. As for the remnants of the Wen Sect… they were herded to a small corner of Qishan, not even a thousandth of the territory they had once owned. They were crammed in, and had to struggle to live.”

Wen Ruohan's eyes went dark at those words.

'They dare to do that to the Wens? How amusing. Do they truly believe their disrespect will go unpunished?'

~~But he wasn't there anymore to punish them. He had started the war.~~

'Because none of them knew what they were doing. You have to look no further than what's happening to Wei Wuxian right now to realize that. They were all foolish and incompetent and if I was the one in charge I would-'

But he wasn't. He had lost.

And now Wei Wuxian was putting himself in this situation for the Wens.

And the resistance from the gentry remained as strong as ever.

"I said don't remember. I'm not so bored as to waste my time remembering a Wen dog's name."

Both Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan looked about five seconds away from murder.

As, notably, did Wei Wuxian.

"Fine. I don't mind explaining further. While you were struggling to catch the bat king, you happened to run into a few Wen disciples who had also been hunting it down. You ordered them to carry spirit attraction flags to serve as bait-"

Meaning they had tried to use one of Wei Wuxian's inventions against Wen Ning.

"-Which, of course, they weren't stupid enough to agree to. One person stepped out and tried to reason with you. That person was Wen Ning. After some delay, the bat king got away so you beat up the Wen cultivators and took them away. Do I need to give you more details? The group hasn't returned yet. Apart from you, I don't know who in the world I can ask about this."

"...You have my humblest apologies, your Excellency," Jin Guangshan said at once, bowing low. "I am astonished to hear that Zixun did such a despicable and cowardly thing!"

There was no way for Jin Guangshan to talk around what Jin Zixun had done. The best thing to do now was to cut off all ties.

"I assure you, he'll face whatever punishment you desire!"

"Will he?" Wen Ruohan asked, tone frighteningly unimpressed.

And Nie Mingjue wanted to protest — to say that it was the Wen Sect's just desserts, after what they had done to all the other sects — but…

But not Wen Ning.

The young, wide eyed, frighteningly kind boy who had saved Wei Wuxian and Jiang Wanyin appeared in their minds. A second later, the watchers recalled how they had first found him: a fierce corpse with chains around his limbs and barely enough consciousness to hear Wei Wuxian's call.

No matter what he felt, no matter how angry Nie Mingjue had been, that boy had done nothing to deserve that.

Unsurprisingly, Jin Zixun didn't agree:

"Wei Wuxian, what do you mean?" he asked. "You're saying you came for him?! You aren't standing up for a Wen dog of all people, are you?"

Whispers began to spread throughout the surrounding crowd.

And Madam Yu cursed the fact that Wei Wuxian was doing this in such a public place.

(But he had tried to move the conversation outside, and he had even been willing to wait if it wouldn't take long. If Wen Ning's life was on the line — if the boy who had gotten her and Jiang Fengmian's ashes back could die — then Wei Wuxian waiting any longer would be unjustifiable.)

(And, if nothing else, Wei Wuxian always tried to be righteous.)

But an argument like that would never convince Jin Zixun. As a result, all Wei Wuxian did was shrug at his accusation, an arrogant grin appearing on his face.

"How is it any of your business whether I want to stand up for him or chop his head off? What I want him for doesn't matter; just give him to me!"

Wei Wuxian's patience was running out.

(Fear began to spread through the surrounding audience.)

'Just tell him the full story, Wei Wuxian!' Jin Zixuan thought. 'He's… Zixun is rude and such, but he… no one could possibly justify this happening to Wen Ning if they know what he did for you and Jiang Wanyin! He…'

He, in the last segment, had more than proved that he didn't care at all what Wei Wuxian had to say.

'But he… but surely…'

"Wei Wuxian, you're truly too bold! The LanlingJin Sect didn't invite you, and yet you had the audacity to come here and run wild! Do you think that you're invincible? That no one has the courage to confront you? Do you want to outrun the heavens?"

Wei Wuxian raised an eyebrow mockingly: "You're comparing yourself to the heavens? Excuse me for saying so, but your face seems a little too thick, doesn't it?"

Jin Zixun flushed at his words.

And a deranged smile formed on Wen Ruohan's face.

'A man with no talent at all… no skill in cultivation or swordsmanship or politics, dares to speak down to the Wens and Wei Wuxian? People in this crowd may have fought back against me eventually, but how many minor sects did they allow me to destroy before then? The only reason you have the 'courage to confront' Wei Wuxian is because that Jiang brat has no idea what he's doing as a sect leader. If I had Wei Wuxian, if I was still there, if I was in control, none of this would be happening!'

(But he had tried to gain control, and lost. And now there was nothing he could do about this.)

And then, before Jin Zixun could speak up again, Jin Guangshan stepped forward and calmly said, "It's not a matter worth arguing over in any case. You youngsters, there's no need to lose your tempers over such things."

"My brother is hardly inconsequential," Wen Qing hissed at him, and Jiang Yanli nodded firmly in agreement.

"I meant to imply no such thing," he hurried to counter. "I only-"

"However, Young Master Wei, to be honest… barging into the LanlingJin Sect's private banquet is indeed inappropriate."

'And, like always, Wei Wuxian knows that there are plenty of things more important than being proper,' Lan Qiren thought, some frustration boiling over. The real Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji also frowned deeply.

(Because their other selves were right there. If these versions of them just knew Wei Wuxian better, understood him better, then they would see how right he was. Unfortunately, they lacked the knowledge their real selves had gained.)

'He only spoke up when Jin Zixun was at a disadvantage,' Wei Wuxian realized. 'What, is he annoyed about what happened at Phoenix Mountain?'

Nevertheless, Wei Wuxian nodded in acknowledgement of Jin Guangshan's point, turning away from Jin Zixun to face him entirely.

"Sect Leader Jin, it was never my intention to disturb your private banquet. My apologies. However, the whereabouts of the people Young Master Jin took are still unclear. Every second counts; a few moments delay could make me too late. A person in that group has saved me before. I can't sit back when they're in danger. Please excuse my rudeness; I will make up for what I've done at a later date."

And there it was. He had explained everything important and said everything he should need to. The Wens were taken away under false pretenses — or, rather, no pretenses at all — and one member of that group was someone whom Wei Wuxian owed a life debt. What more needed to be said?

(A lot, apparently.)

"Regardless, I'm sure this matter can wait a little while longer. Come, come. You can sit down first. There's no need to rush; let's talk about this."

Jin Guangyao had already prepared a seat for him. Jin Guangshan stepped forward, reaching out as if to guide Wei Wuxian to where he wanted him to be. Wei Wuxian stepped back.

"Thank you, Sect Leader Jin, but I won't be staying long. This matter can't be delayed. Please let this be sorted out as soon as possible."

"At least he's still being polite," Lan Qiren observed. It wasn't exactly working, but the effort was still clear.

"There's no need to hurry," Jin Guangshan said, stepping closer to Wei Wuxian again. "Though, if we get down to it, there are indeed a few things that the two of us should discuss. Now that you're here, why don't we take the opportunity to sort these things out?"

Wei Wuxian raised a brow: "Sort out what?"

"Young Master Wei, we've talked about this a few times already, haven't we?" he said, shaking his head as though finding Wei Wuxian's childish priorities amusing. "Don't you remember. During the Sunshot Campaign… you used a certain object."

"Oh, you did mention before. You mean the Tiger Seal?"

"Yes," Jin Guangshan said, his smile growing wider.

And a chill came down Lan Wangji's spine.

(Jin Guangshan's gaze at that moment looked identical to how he was when speaking to Lan Wangji in the previous segment.)

"It's said the Stygian Tiger Seal was made from the iron of a sword you found in the cave of the Xuanwu of Slaughter," he said, and the simulation shifted to replay the moment the seal was formed. "You only used it on the battlefield once, but its power was horrifying. A few of our cultivators were even affected by the residual force-"

"Please get to the point," Wei Wuxian interrupted.

"That is the point. In that battle, in addition to the Wen Sect, our side also took great losses. In my opinion, such a weapon is quite difficult to control. To leave it in the hands of just one person would…"

He trailed off as Wei Wuxian began to laugh.

And if Lan Wangji were anyone else, he probably would have joined in.

Was it possible that the losses the Jin took from what Wei Wuxian did were too great to be ignored? Sure. Was it possible — likely, even — that the simulated Hanguang-jun and Jin Guangshan's concerns about Wei Wuxian's control weren't completely unfounded? Of course. But were the words of someone so obviously trying to get something worth taking at face value? Not at all.

(And after everything that had happened so far, if Wei Wuxian did end up pressured into losing control, it was clear that any spiritual cultivator would have surely qi deviated long before.)

As was continuing to be proved by the very scene they were watching.

"Sect Leader Jin, let me ask you something," Wei Wuxian requested. "Do you think that, now that the Qishan Wen Sect is gone, the Lanling Jin Sect has a right to replace it?"

The tension in the room could cut glass.

"That's not-" Jin Zixuan began, then cut off. He remembered the burning of the Cloud Recesses, and the Massacre of Lotus Pier. The horrors that the Wen Sect committed under Wen Ruohan were almost too plentiful to count. But then he recalled the Xuanwu cave, and how the Wen Sect tried hanging them up as bait.

(And how, not even a minute ago, Wei Wuxian accused Jin Zixuan's cousin of trying to do the exact same thing.)

(The only difference was that the Jin Sect's victims couldn't fight back on their own.)

The silence among the watchers was present among the simulated cultivators as well. Wei Wuxian's eyes swept over the room, practically daring anyone to deny it.

"Everything belongs to you? Everyone has to listen to you?" Wei Wuxian grinned. "Looking at how the Lanling Jin Sect is acting now, I almost thought I was looking at the Qishan Wen Sect's empire all over again."

Jin Guangshan paused, unprepared to deal with such accusations.

And Wei Wuxian wasn't wrong. In fact, he seemed to be the only one realizing that the current situation was paralleling the previous one so closely. And yet, no one seemed to listen.

During Nie Mingjue's memories, Wei Wuxian had seen this version of himself. Upon observing the Yiling Patriarch's general demeanor and refusal to bring his sword around, he had flushed bright red.

'Ah, I'm so embarrassed!' he had thought, turning away. 'I look so pretentious! I can't believe I did this! I wish I could go back in time and beat myself up!'

It was somewhat clear what Wei Wuxian meant. He certainly hadn't been trying to get along with people from the other sects. Putting aside refusing to bring his sword, if he hadn't gotten into a fight with Jin Zixun — if he just bowed his head as everyone wanted him to — then perhaps this situation would be going differently. But-

'Almost all the spirits and corpses were summoned to the Yunmeng Jiang Sect's ground. There'll definitely be a number of cultivators interested in joining them.'

'Well, what can we do about that?' Sect Leader Yao sighed. 'It's not our fault our sects don't have a Wei Wuxian.'

Lotus Pier had been hurt by the war, but it had become one of the great sects again because of how Wei Wuxian would 'show off.' If he bowed his head, Yunmeng wouldn't be in as good of a position as it was.

And, putting aside how he 'should have' acted before, with Wen Ning's life on the line, this was not the time to be dilly-dallying with pointless pleasantries and other conversations. He needed to act now.

Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen, who could see there other selves standing to the side, not getting involved, frowned deeply.

There had been numerous shouts of protest from the people gathered around, but Wei Wuxian seemed to pay them no mind. He didn't regret what he'd said; it seemed clear to him that the Jins were following in the footsteps of the Wens.

(And, just like when he mentioned how inevitable it was that the Wens would attack the Pier, no one cared to listen.)

"Wei Wuxian!" someone nearby suddenly spoke up. "You should watch your words!"

"Did I say something wrong? Forcing living people to be bait and beating them up when they refuse to obey — how is that any different from what the Qishan Wen Sect did?"

"Of course it's different!" another guest of the Jins spoke up. "The Wen-dogs did all kinds of evil. The end they arrived at is only karmic retribution! We avenged an eye for an eye, letting them taste the fruit they themselves had sown. What's wrong with doing that?!"

"Take revenge on the ones who bit you. Wen Ning's branch doesn't have any blood on their hands! Don't tell me you find them guilty by association?!"

Once upon a time, Nie Mingjue's answer would have been a resounding 'yes.' After all, the wealth the Wens acquired through their conquests was used by Wen Qing and Wen Ning's family. Every time the Wens conquered a sect, they were the ones benefiting from it. They could act as they pleased due to Wen Ruohan's protection.

But Wen Qing and Wen Ning hadn't stood on the sides. They had fought back when they could.

(And how many minor sects had Nie Mingjue been powerless to help while the Wens took them down one by one?)

“Young Master Wei, isn’t the only proof that they don’t have blood on their hands your say so? The only evidence is your word. Don’t you have anything more?”

“The only proof that they have killed anyone is what you say! Shouldn’t you be the first to show evidence? Why are you instead asking me?”

It was a fair point.

And yet, no one really seemed to care.

He had mentioned that Wen Ning was taken prisoner unjustly and Jin Zixun hadn’t opposed his description of the events. He had told everyone that he owed Wen Ning a life debt, and that Wen Ning’s branch hadn’t contributed during the Sunshot Campaign. He had even promised to pay for interrupting the dinner at a later time, when lives weren’t on the line.

What else, at this point, could he say?

‘Wei Wuxian,’ Wen Qing thought, a sad smile forming on her face. ‘You… thank you. For trying. I’m so sorry I ever thought you would be responsible for what happened to A-Ning. Thank you. Thank you. Thank you.’

“Back then, when the Wen Sect moved to slaughter us, they were a thousand times more cruel than we are now! They didn’t treat us with justice and morality, so why should we treat them like that?”

“Oh, so you admit that what’s happening to Wen Ning is immoral?!” Jiang Cheng shouted, mouth somewhat open in disbelief. He glanced over, and saw his sister still hovering by Wen Qing’s side.

The renowned doctor looked almost doll-like; she was far too still.

“Oh, is that how it is?” Wei Wuxian asked, his grin taking on an even more dangerous edge. “The Wen dogs did all kinds of evil, so anyone who had the surname Wen should be killed? That can’t be it, right? After all, many of the clans doing well right now defected from the Wen Sect not too long ago, right? In this very hall, aren’t there quite a few sect leaders who used to be under the Wen Sect’s wing?”

‘Reasoning with them will never work,’ Wen Ruohan thought, and he would have laughed about it if this situation were even the slightest bit humorous. ‘At least when I did something I knew what I was doing. They all just…. I most certainly will not forget this insult to the Wen Sect. If I was there, I would-’

But he wasn’t there. He wasn't there, and therefore the Wen Sect had no protection. His legacy was obsolete; everything he had ever worked for would be subjected to the whims of idiots who weren’t fit to even lick Wei Wuxian’s shoes. And sure, that was partly Meng Yao’s fault.

(But really, he only had himself to blame.)

And yet, despite that, and despite everything Wen Chao took from him, Wei Wuxian was still there staring the Sect Leaders down.

“If anyone with the surname Wen can be used as a whipping post for our anger, regardless of whether they’re innocent or not, does that mean I can take those formerly involved Sect Leaders and deal with them as I please?”

His eyes flashed red and he placed a hand over Chenqing.

“If I were to kill all of them right now, I don't think anyone would be able to complain.”

“A-Xian, calm down!” Jiang Yanli shouted at once. There was an excitement to the energy around them now, Wei Wuxian’s anger fueling it until it perked up in anticipation. But right now, all Wei Wuxian was doing was making enemies out of the surrounding Sect Leaders.

He had to calm down.

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli tried again, despite being fully aware the simulation couldn’t hear. “A-Xian, if you just reason with them-”

By saying what? What was there that he could say about the situation that hadn’t been said already?

(Even Jiang Yanli’s older self had known that Wei Wuxian alone would never be able to convince any sect leaders. It would need to be a true member of the gentry; someone of noble birth. Someone who couldn't be called ‘the son of a servant.’ She had known it would never work if it was just him.)

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli realized at once. “A-Xian, you need to find A-Cheng!”

“There’s no time!” Jiang Cheng pointed out, his body tense like a spring wound up and about to explode. “And besides, it might be me but that future version of me — though he’s better than the far-future version he still-”

Wasn’t someone the current Jiang Cheng trusted.

“Wei Ying!”

All the watchers froze.

That was Lan Wangji’s voice. The fury around Wei Wuxian seemed to ebb momentarily at the words.

Jin Guangyao stepped forward: “Young Master Wei, please don’t react so hastily. There’s still time for discussion.”

Nie Mingjue gritted his teeth and hissed, “That’s exactly the point you silver-tongued snake! There isn’t time! We don’t know how much longer Wen Ning will be alive!”

“Wei Wuxian!” Jin Guangshan stood up.

And a feeling identical to how he had felt when Jin Zixun was talking overcame Jin Zixuan.

‘A-Die… please just shut up.

“Wei Ying, just because Sect Leader Jiang isn’t here… that doesn’t mean you can be so impertinent!” He was flushed faced and embarrassed by what Wei Wuxian had done.

But Wei Wuxian’s eyes just narrowed.

“Do you think I wouldn’t be doing this if he was here? If I want to kill someone, who could stop me?”

He slowly turned, gazing over the crowd.

“Who would dare to stop me?!”

A half laugh, half sigh left Nie Huaisang’s lips and he shook his head.

“Looks like negotiations are over,” he mumbled.

(Though it definitely didn’t seem like Wei Wuxian would have gotten very far even if he had the patience to continue.)

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan both turned away, overcome by both Wei Wuxian’s frustration — transmitted by the energy around them — as well as their own.

(Because surely the people here wouldn’t be able to excuse the situation if they understood it. And yet, Wei Wuxian had already told them everything there was to know. They just weren’t willing to listen so long as the information was from him — so long as it was about the defeated Wens.)

“Wei Ying, put Chenqing down,” Lan Wangji advised.

At this, finally, Wei Wuxian turned to look at him.

‘I’m worried about him,’ the real Lan Wangji thought. ‘I don’t want the world to turn against him.’

But-

‘I don’t believe him. I’m not trying to help him, I’m trying to stop him.’

Because at this point in time they cared about each other, but they didn’t truly understand each other.

(They wouldn’t start to until Wei Wuxian came back to life thirteen years later.)

However, although the current Lan Wangji’s understanding of Wei Wuxian was nothing in comparison to his future self’s, he was still vastly different from everyone else there.

As Wei Wuxian stared at his reflection in Lan Wangji's light eyes he seemed to snap out of the rage that had been building inside of him.

He had a job to do, and no more time to waste.

"Jin Zixun!" he shouted. "Enough stalling. I'm sure everyone here has realized my patience is limited. With how much time we've already wasted… I'll give you to the count of three. One…"

Jin Zixun hesitated, but floundered upon seeing the expression on Jin Guangshan's face.

"Two…"

"F-fine! Fine. It's just a few Wen-dogs. Take them if you want to. I don't have any more time to waste on you. They're at Qiongqi Path; go find them on your own!"

He had gotten permission.

But, after what had just occurred, this small victory was nowhere near enough to lessen the frustration of either the watchers or Wei Wuxian.

Wei Wuxian laughed coldly: "If only you'd spoken up sooner."

However, Wei Wuxian didn't have enough time to deal with Jin Zixun now. He turned on his heel and left as quickly as possible, unwilling to waste the precious seconds he had.

But the simulation remained behind and the watchers got to see his departing back. Slowly, they looked around at each other and frowned.

"...I should have done more," Lan Wangji acknowledged. "I should have investigated, at the very least."

"At least you did something," Lan Xichen pointed out. It was an odd phrase to hear from him. He was always gentle beyond comparison, and more patient than any other. However, as he watched his other self remain silent despite what Wei Wuxian had brought up-

'Da-ge warned me about Meng Yao, and I dismissed his concerns,' Lan Xichen thought, eyes growing cloudy. 'And now Wei Wuxian warned us all about the Jins, and I still held back. Da-ge died because of my decision in that first case. I wonder… how many will die because of my hesitation here?'

And Nie Mingjue, meanwhile, frowned deeply.

'I wasn't at this meeting, but, if I had been….'

He didn't even need to finish that thought.

Those who remained in the hall looked equally pensive. However, just by observing the expressions on their faces, it was more than clear that their thoughts were far less charitable toward Wei Wuxian.

At that moment, Jin Guangshan stood up and kicked the table in front of him, sending it toppling over to the floor. The gold dishes and silver platters rolled down the stairs and slammed onto the ground.

'Yes,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'You see, now, how big of a mistake it was to allow him to go uncontrolled. A beast like that belongs collared and caged. It doesn't matter how beautiful it seems; it's nothing but arrogance to believe you can control it while it's free.'

The simulated Jin Guangshan stormed out of the hall.

"Fath-" Jin Guangyao cut off, seeing that Sect Leader Jin had already left. He hesitated then nearly seemed to deflate. Then, he noticed an infuriated Jin Zixun trying to leave.

"Zixun!" Jin Guangyao shouted, raising his voice. But Jin Zixun just threw his cup of alcohol Jin Guangyao's way, sending it crashing against his cousin's chest and leaving a large stain.

However, no one in the audience seemed to notice. A cold sweat was running down everyone's back and their eyes seemed wide in fear. Their attention hadn't strayed from the door Wei Wuxian had exited not long ago.

Madam Yu scoffed.

"Don't you see what you just did, Wei Wuxian?" she asked, giving a nearly deranged laugh. "How exactly do you think making everyone terrified of you will help? They end up killing you in the end! You can't take on everyone by yourself!"

"So he should just let my brother die?!" Wen Qing shouted back, standing up. "I won't allow you to speak to him that way. Not when he did all this just to save my brother's life."

"If he had acted differently before-"

"You whipped Wei Wuxian for sunbathing!" Nie Mingjue shouted back. "I took out just as much prey as him during that competition. Our Chief Cultivator over here has destroyed whole sects without anyone making so much as a peep of protest. It's not his actions alone that are turning people against him."

(Because if Wei Wuxian had actually been Jiang Fengmian's bastard son, it's was entirely possible that none of this would be happening.)

"A-Yao," Lan Xichen said, rushing over to Jin Guangyao to check on the stain Jin Zixun had given him. There was obviously concern in his expression, but none of it appeared focused on Wei Wuxian.

'Did you… not hear what he just said?' Lan Xichen thought, staring at his other self. 'Do you really not think you should be checking up on the claims he made? You're not even going to try to investigate?'

Earlier, when they heard about how Nie Mingjue and Nie Mingjue alone had stood up against the Jin Sect regarding Xue Yang, Lan Xichen had thought his other self had probably been busy with something else. Then Nie Mingjue's memories were played, and he watched his other self happily discuss with Meng Yao about the watchtowers during that time instead. Neither he nor Nie Mingjue had confronted Jin Guangshan, but Nie Mingjue had at least tried.

Jin Guangyao reassured Lan Xichen and asked him to remain seated, but Lan Xichen pulled out a snow-white handkerchief and gave it to Jin Guangyao.

"Go change your clothes," he suggested.

"I can't just leave, can I?" Jin Guangyao asked back.

'What are you doing? You should be following Wei Wuxian to see if he's right about the Jin. How can you be so unconcerned about all this?!'

But, despite the real Lan Xichen's shock, his other self continued to fret over Jin Guangyao instead.

At that moment, Jin Guangyao's exhaustion seemed to boil over into a bit of bitterness and he said, "Young Master Wei really is too impulsive sometimes. How could he speak like that in front of so many sects?"

"Impulsive?!" Wen Qing repeated.

"Was he wrong?"

Lan Wangji was the one who had spoken, and his words were colder than ever before.

But he, also, did not follow after.

His future self had. The Hanguang-jun of thirteen years later had actively fought off every other sect for Wei Wuxian. But the one featured in the simulation right now didn't seem to realize how dire the consequences of this could be.

(And, after the kiss, couldn't bring himself to chase after Wei Wuxian regardless.)

At that moment, having considered Lan Wangji's words, Jin Guangyao decided to respond:

"No, he's not wrong," Jin Guangyao admitted with a laugh. "But it's because he's right that he can't say such a thing in front of them, right?"

'Back then, when the Wen-dogs moved to slaughter us, they were a thousand times more cruel than we are now! They didn't treat us with justice and morality, so why should we treat them like that?!'

Nie Mingjue gave a bitter laugh: “So everyone involved knows that what they’re doing is wrong, they just don’t care.”

Frowning slightly, Jin Guangshan pointed out, “Sect Leader Nie, just because you weren’t there-”

“No worries, I’m including myself,” he said. “I’m sure that as soon as I hear that he’s worried about ‘Wen-dogs’ I lose all interest in investigating the situation. I… he-”

He turned, facing the corner of the room where the two Wens stood. Wen Ruohan had been unquestionably cruel, and had taken far too much from everyone, from Nie Mingjue, personally. Wen Ruohan could experience a thousand evils and Nie Mingjue wouldn’t try to intervene even once.

But Wen Qing — Wen Qing was different.

“I’m sorry,” Nie Mingjue said. “I…”

Wen Qing couldn’t give even a bitter smile.

(Because no matter how the real versions felt, they had no power to change what was about to happen.)

And as if in proof of this, the simulated Lan Xichen’s frown deepened: “Young Master Wei’s heart has changed.”

Those words made Lan Wangji wince as if in pain, and he turned to look where Wei Wuxian had just exited from.

And the real Lan Xichen was frozen.

“I…” he paused. “What did I just say?”

“You said his heart has changed,” Jiang Cheng reminded him.

“But A-Y… Jin Guangyao just admitted he was doing the right thing. Why would my response be… why would I…” he gave a strange, half laugh. “Am I blind?”

‘No,’ Wen Ruohan thought, ‘Just enjoying your blissful ignorance. All of you thinking you can call yourselves righteous…. If I was in charge — if I was in control-’

Except trying to gain control was exactly what had led to this outcome, wasn’t it? If he had just been satisfied with the amount of power he had, his sect would still be okay.

The simulation moved them outside just in time for them to see Wei Wuxian turn the corner.

“I know where he is. Let’s go,” Wei Wuxian said, making Wen Qing look up at once. She was covered in dust and dirt and was still far more thin than she should be, but none of that stopped her from rushing up to Wei Wuxian as soon as she heard those words. However, with how weak her body was, in her rush to make it to him she stepped wrong and twisted her ankle, her spinning head making her unable to walk straight. Wei Wuxian caught her before she made contact with the ground, holding her trembling body delicately.

Wen Qing herself seemed indifferent to the state her other self was in, far more concerned with her brother than that. Her uncle, on the other hand, turned even colder.

Wen Qing was one of the smartest people he knew. She was far more capable than the fools who had been dining extravagantly inside Koi Tower's Glamor Hall. She, of all people, should not look like this.

But Wei Wuxian was helping her, even if he might be the only one who would.

"Do you want me to take you somewhere to rest?" Wei Wuxian offered. "I can go alone. I'll definitely bring back Wen Ning."

"No! No," she shook her head desperately, clinging to Wei Wuxian's robes. "No, I'll go! I have to go!"

Madam Jin gritted her teeth together, looking over at her husband momentarily. As far as she knew, Jin Guangshan hadn't touched Wen Qing (personally, at least). He hadn't damaged her and he hadn't tried to seduce her.

But he was still partly responsible for this once proud-woman begging on her knees, and Madam Jin would be sure to remember it.

Ouyang Zizhen cleared his throat then said, "After Wen Qionglin went missing, Wen-guniang ran from Qishan to Yunmeng with almost no rest. She hadn't closed her eyes in days. Once she saw Senior Wei, she urged him and begged him as if she had gone crazy."

A flashback appeared, showing just that. Unable to clearly understand her in the state she was in, Wei Wuxian bought her some pork buns. Wen Qing accepted them with trembling hands, staring at them for a moment before hurriedly forcing them down her throat.

"She knew she wouldn't last long without sustenance, so she ate as quickly as possible," Zizhen finished.

As Wei Wuxian stared at her worn-down figure a memory flashed into his mind. It was him and Jiang Cheng while they were on the run from the Wens. Jiang Cheng was unconscious, but Wei Wuxian, as he stood before Wen Qing all those years ago, looked just as broken and desperate as she did now.

"Your positions have reversed," Wen Ruohan observed. "But you both chose to save each other."

"...So it seems," Wen Qing agreed.

Wei Wuxian and Wen Qing had never met in their world. At this point in the simulation, they had only seen each other a handful of times. Despite that, they had been able to trust and rely on each other when they had no one else. Wei Wuxian had gotten help from her and Wen Ning to save Jiang Wanyin's life, get back the ashes of the Jiangs, and, possibly, transfer his core to Jiang Cheng. Now, Wen Qing was relying on him to repay the favor. It would be hard to describe the relationship they shared in words, but both their lives had been reshaped by this bond.

Which was why, now, when Wen Qing finished her food and began explaining again through fear-filled cries, Wei Wuxian assured her immediately.

"It's fine," he said. "I'll definitely bring back Wen Ning."

"I knew I shouldn't have left! But I-I had no choice! They forced me to go to another city. When I came back, Wen Ning and the others were all gone! I knew I shouldn't have left him alone!"

Panic was beginning to consume her.

"He'll be alright-"

"He won't! A-Ning's been skittish ever since he was young. He's cautious and timid. He can't hire anyone with even the slightest temper to be his subordinate — they're all a bunch of mice like him! He has no idea what to do during an emergency if I'm not with him!"

"Qing-guniang, breathe," Jiang Yanli whispered to her. Although not as distraught as the simulated version was, Wen Qing knew she should listen to that advice. She took in a large breath, then nearly felt her legs collapse from under her.

Nie Mingjue was by her side at once, arms extended as though he had been about to catch her.

"...We can't touch each other right now," she reminded him, phasing her hand through his as proof. He faltered at that then looked away, knowing there was nothing he could do.

"Qing-guniang," Jiang Yanli began again. "I… have faith in your brother. He chose to save A-Xian and A-Cheng all on his own, didn't he? And in the far future he took on Song Zizhen without missing a beat. He might be stronger than you think."

But the attempted assurances felt empty and hollow when faced with the terror the simulated Wen Qing was experiencing.

A flashback formed. It was a younger Wei Wuxian carrying an unconscious Jiang Cheng on his back, leaving Wen Qing behind. Her face was regal and proud, and her posture upright and strong.

"No matter what the result of this campaign turns out to be, we, from now on, owe each other nothing. All debts are settled."

But then, just an hour before, Wen Qing had run into Wei Wuxian again. She grabbed onto his hand and kneeled in front of him, practically clawing at him in desperation.

"Wei Wuxian, Wei Wuxian, Young Master Wei! Please help me. I really can't find anyone else to help me. Please, you have to help me find Wen Ning. I have no option other than you!"

None of her pride remained, because she did indeed have no one else.

A thought which made Jiang Cheng look away.

'The… the person she actually saved was me. I got caught trying to distract the Wens to protect Wei Wuxian, but they don't know that. Everyone seems to be thinking that Wei Wuxian's father's status is the reason why no one's listening to him, but that… that wouldn't be a problem with me. So… why didn't she come to the Yunmeng Jiang Sect for help?'

And why, now, was he far too terrified of the answer to that question to ask it aloud?

"Qiongqi path was an ancient path that ran through a valley," Lan Jingyi added. "According to legend, the path was where the founder of the Qishan Wen Sect, Wen Mao, rose to fame in just one battle. Hundreds of years ago, he fought a divine beast for a full eighty one days straight, taking its life in the end. The divine beast was a Qiongqi, a creature of chaos known to punish the good and encourage the evil."

That was the legacy of the Wen Sect which Wen Ruohan's choices had destroyed. Their great history was now a road in which Wen Mao's descendents were unjustly kept imprisoned.

If Wei Wuxian had come to his side, it was entirely possible he would have won the war. He had brainstormed time and time again for things he could have offered Wei Wuxian to ensure the boy's loyalty, but had to throw away those ideas each time. And yet, the closest Wei Wuxian came to being allied with the Wen was now, after they had lost — when they had nothing.

It was a strange situation.

"How accurate the story is and whether the following Sect Leaders of the Wen Sect embellished it is impossible to determine. Unlike, I might add, the great victory Hanguang-jun and Senior Wei had against the Xuanwu of slaughter-"

There was a clearing of a throat in the background. At this point, Lan Sizhui had guided him back to the script so many times that he didn't even need to say anything out loud for Lan Jingyi to get the message.

"Ah, right. Anyways, hundreds of years later, this dangerous rift had turned into a tourist attraction and a focus of praise. After the Sunshot Campaign, when the sects divided up the area the Qishan Wen Sect used to hold, Qiongqi path was taken by the Lanling Jin Sect. Originally, the tall walls of the valley were carved to depict the story of Wen Mao, but, now that it belonged to the Lanling Jin Sect, they were hurrying to take that down."

Wen Ruohan twitched, and Jin Guangshan felt his life flash before his eyes. He silently moved further from the Chief Cultivator. Wen Ruohan might not be able to hurt him while they were both in the simulation, but that didn't apply once they left.

"Right now it was in the middle of reconstruction. All the relics on both sides were being chiseled down and new pictures were being carved. Naturally, once it was complete, it would be given a new name to emphasize the Lanling Jin Sect's honor."

Jin Zixuan blushed at the description, finding it strangely reminiscent of the horse riding explanation. A thinly veiled mockery of the Jin Sect's focus on appearances that Jin Zixuan couldn't truly dispute. It was embarrassing-

"Such a large-scale undertaking would need many laborers. There were no better candidates for this than prisoners of war from the Wen Sect, who had become homeless dogs after the Sunshot Campaign."

Jin Zixuan's flush disappeared, his embarrassment giving way to a heavy feeling of guilt at that description.

"Prisoners of war?" Wen Qing repeated, her usual self control crumbling. "A-Ning wasn't a prisoner of war! He didn't fight! He was taken captive afterwards while night hunting! That's not…"

She couldn't finish.

(The remnants of the Wen Sect were herded into a single area. It wouldn't be right to call them prisoners of war, but they probably were in all but name. Once that was settled, moving a few to a labor camp on the slimmest of justifications probably seemed like common sense to Jin Zixun.)

The simulation shifted and the world became dark for night. Wei Wuxian and Wen Qing walked swiftly, the latter hurrying as fast as she could given her malnourished and exhausted body. Every so often Wei Wuxian would have to help her steady herself if she stumbled along the way.

"Why… why aren't they flying?" Jin Zixuan asked. "Wouldn't Wei Wuxian be able to carry both of them on his sword if he wanted to?"

"It looks like Suibian is still in his room," Lan Xichen pointed out. "As for why he didn't use it to get to Koi Tower… maybe he just forgot? He and Wen Qing did meet in Yiling, but perhaps he thought Wen Ning would be closer than he was."

Growling in frustration, Jiang Cheng ran a hand through his hair and said, "Damn it, Wei Wuxian. If you'd just come back to the Pier you could have picked up your sword and gotten my help. Demonic cultivation isn't useful for quick transportation, you arrogant idiot. Just ask for help if you need it."

Thrown off his game by the current situation of the Wen Sect, Wen Ruohan very nearly found himself growling openly at Jiang Wanyin's words. The boy might not know the (now very likely) truth about the core transfer, but the thoughtless scolding — coming from ignorance — grated at his mind.

'You're right, going to his sect leader for backup would be the logical thing to do,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'Now then, why don't we consider how your far-future self acts every time Wen Ning or Wei Wuxian is mentioned, and maybe we can see why he didn't.'

(That wasn't really fair to say. Wen Ruohan was making assumptions about Jiang Wanyin's current character on something he would do later, and who knew what would happen between those times. Unfortunately, like always, he didn't care much about being fair.)

The two of them entered the mouth of the valley and found rows of temporary shacks. The place seemed nearly desolate with the exception of a bent-over figure in the distance. She walked slowly, each step giving her immense pain, and carried a large flag through the heavy rain. As she moved closer, more and more of her features could be made out. She was an elderly woman carrying a toddler on her back.

Wen Qing sucked in a breath. By her other self's description of events, she had known to expect something like this. It was still flooring to actually see a member of her family stuck here. While she didn't recognize the toddler, she knew he was family just the same.

Darkness flashed in Wen Ruohan's eyes once more.

The toddler was strapped onto the woman's back with cloth, leaving him unable to move. He seemed to be completely absorbed in nibbling at his own fingers, staring at his hand in fascination every once in a while. It would have been quite an adorable sight.

(If the boy wasn't so obviously too thin for his age.)

Exhausted, the older woman had to set down the flag for a moment, stumbling as she did. That appeared to be enough to snap the simulated Wen Qing into action.

"Granny, it's me!" she called out, running over.

Unable to clearly distinguish or hear who it was in the rain, the elderly woman hurriedly picked up the flag and raised it high again, trembling in fear. When Wen Qing ran over, 'Granny Wen' subconsciously raised her arms, trying to defend the child and her own head.

Jin Zixuan felt sick.

"But… but Zixun ran into cultivators," he pointed out slowly. "And-and he took them back unjustly, but… there shouldn't be any reason for these two to be here."

Those words seemed to cut into Nie Mingjue bit by bit.

(He had only just recently been convinced about Wen Qing and Wen Ning, but his other self shouldn't have had to be convinced in regards to a grandmother too weak to cause any harm — in regards to a toddler. And sure, he might have not specifically known about or approved the presence of these two here, but he was the sect leader of the strongest sect next to the Jins. It was his job to know these things.)

(And that Nie Mingjue either hadn't noticed or hadn't cared.)

"What is this?" Wen Qing asked, taking the flag from the woman. "What are you doing?"

She looked over at the flag.

The crest of the Qishan Wen Sect was painted on top. However, above that, there was a large red 'X,' making the sect's symbol almost impossible to read. The cloth had been torn up as well, heavily damaged by an intentional force.

'I see,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'She's probably too old for labor, so the Jin Sect found some other task to give her under the guise of 'initiating self reflection,' huh?'

"And I suppose this is the sort of thing your sect finds amusing, Guangshan?" Wen Ruohan asked, deceptively softly.

"No!" he responded at once. "No, no. I can assure you, my other self would have had nothing to do with-"

Wen Ruohan merely raised a hand, cutting Jin Guangshan off in an instant. All the while, the Chief Cultivator's eyes hadn't strayed from the scene before him.

At that moment, the woman finally managed to realize who was before her. Her jaw dropped.

And Wen Qing stepped forward, clutching her hand to ask, "Granny, where's A-Ning? Where's Uncle Four and the rest? Please, tell me where A-Ning is!"

Granny Wen glanced up to where Wei Wuxian stood then faltered, unable to say anything. Her eyes were laser focused on the distinctive black and red robes he wore, as well as the flute by his side. Eventually, however, she looked toward the valley.

Without even pausing to think about it, Wen Qing straightened up and spirited that way.

"M-maybe you'll make it in time," Jiang Yanli suggested, trying to calm Wen Qing's (and her own) nerves. She recalled the steely confidence her other self had wielded while confronting Jin Zixun in the last segment, and how easily that Jiang Yanli had been able to reassure Wei Wuxian.

(But she was not that woman yet, but she very much wanted to be.)

They followed Wen Qing and Wei Wuxian through the long pathroads of the valley, the torches that lined the slides flickering wildly as they went. Wen Qing's desperation spurred her on and Wei Wuxian was there to catch her every time she stumbled.

Despite the rain, the covered torches provided just enough light for them to see what laid at the deepest part of the valley: dozens of prisoners, ghastly pale, laboring under the command of the Jins. All their spiritual power was sealed, and the fifteen or so inspectors, riding on horses, criticized them harshly while they worked.

Those inspectors weren't necessarily weak, but they weren't notable either. They were nobodies. People who only had positions of power now due to the friends they'd luckily made before.

~~They reminded Wen Ruohan of Wen Chao. What should have been a positive reminder through the connection to his son instead filled him with an even greater rage.~~

'Incompetent weaklings. They wouldn't be able to raise their heads in my presence before, but they think, now that I'm gone, they can mock the Wen Sect?'

"Where did you come from? Who let you come in here?!" one inspector called out, seeing Wen Qing hurriedly approach through the rain. She paid no mind to his question, looking around at all the laborers with a frantic intensity. Every tired, grime-covered face was dismissed one after the other.

None of them were Wen Ning.

Wen Qing felt her heart rate increasing again.

"What are you doing?!"

"I'm here to find someone!" her simulated self shouted. "I'm here to find someone!"

Uninterested in her answer, the inspector pulled something from his waist and said, "I don't care if you're looking for someone or not. Leave! If you don't…"

He trailed off, his eyes leaving her figure and focusing on the man who had brought her here. Just like with Granny Wen, the black robes and flute attracted his eyes immediately and left him completely unable to speak. The weapon that he had taken out remained still, the inspector unable to even consider using it while Wei Wuxian stood there.

The watchers hated the way Wei Wuxian's new reputation followed him around after his return from the Burial Mounds. They didn't like how people kept provoking him, and they hated what it had caused Jin Ling to do.

But right now, it filled most of them with a near-sadistic sense of glee.

The inspector, who had seemed so threatening a moment ago, was barely able to breathe when Wei Wuxian's glare landed on him.

'No, he's not looking at me,' the inspector realized a moment later. 'It's… my iron band he's looking at.'

He looked back at the object in his hand. A branding rod, just like what had scarred Wei Wuxian's chest a few short years ago. The only difference was that there was now a peony instead of a sun.

"Guangshan!" Lan Qiren raised his voice. "Are you insane?! There's a toddler among them! How can you not have realized this would be going too far?!"

"How are you any better than the Wens?" Nie Mingjue asked as well (because he hated Wen Ruohan and everything the man had done, but these people were not him). "I — even the Wens just used it against full grown cultivators! You think we didn't see who was here?! Not a single one of them can fight!"

"Ah-well," Jin Guangshan stuttered, glazing briefly at the dark void that was surrounding Wen Ruohan. "You-you see, we only saw the Wens use it against cultivators, but that doesn't mean they didn't use it against civilians. The Wens lost the war, so we're enacting justice — repaying an eye for an eye."

"But we're not doing this to the soldiers!" Jin Zixuan shouted, standing up.

"Zixuan?" Madam Jin asked.

"I…" he paused, glancing at his mother, then looked back at his father. "F-father, these people aren't soldiers! Wei Wuxian told us the full story! They were the remnants of the Wen Sect and Zixun imprisoned them unjustly. We — we're worse than the Wens if this is true!"

"Zixuan!" Madam Jin shouted.

But Jiang Yanli, his fiance, hadn't backed down in the future no matter how much physically weaker she was than Madam Jin and Jin Zixun. The least Jin Zixuan could do was not back down in front of his own parents.

"A-Niang… we kept wondering how Wei Wuxian would ever even consider killing me. We all agreed he probably wouldn't kill me over, well, upsetting A-Li. But if… if this is true… and if my other-self knew about it…."

Then I more than deserved it.

For a moment, no one could speak.

The inspectors all recognized Wei Wuxian immediately. Now, none of them even tried to stop Wen Qing's search. She ran through the laborers, eyes wide, and shouted as she did.

"A-Ning! A-Ning! It's me!" She looked around. "Where are you? Please, answer me! A-Ning!"

Wen Qing fists clenched together even tighter, and she wouldn't be surprised if she learned her real body had started tensing up as well.

Wen Ruohan, watching with ice-cold eyes, breathed out slowly.

(Morally, he had no room to talk. The hypocrisy was not lost on him.)

(Nevertheless, his desire for vengeance grew.)

"A-Ning!" Wen Qing's shouts continued. "A-Ning! It's A-Jie. It's your A-Jie. I'm here now! A-Ning!"

Slowly, the inspectors dismounted their horses, still staring at Wei Wuxian.

'Are we… supposed to greet him?' one thought. He stepped forward then stepped back.

Their fear couldn't be overcome so easily.

Going to Wei Wuxian was definitely the best option Wen Qing had. When Wen Ning was first taken, she could have run over to Lanling herself. Instead, she took a risk and went to Yunmeng instead. Wei Wuxian could have turned her away or might have been unable to help, but she took that risk. Now, it was more than clear how worthwhile that was.

Even without her former status and wealth, the thing that had drawn Wen Ruohan to her — her brain — was still as sharp as ever.

'Still,' Lan Wangji thought, 'Still, I shouldn't have let them go alone.'

Hanguang-jun was a respected figure in the world of cultivators but he wasn't a sect leader. It was debatable how much he would have actually been able to help if he wasn't able to convince his uncle and brother to join in as well. Despite that, it was crystal clear that the Hanguang-jun of thirteen years later would have gone with Wei Wuxian.

(And despite the gross lack of self control his other self had shown during the kiss, the real Lan Wangji really wished his simulated-self had followed along.)

By now, it had become clear that Wen Ning, if he was around, couldn't hear Wen Qing's calls. She ran over to the inspectors who were still hovering awkwardly around Wei Wuxian.

"Where are the Wen cultivators who were sent here just a few days ago?"

The inspectors all looked over at each other. Eventually, one spoke.

"All the prisoners here are the Wen Sect's cultivators. New ones are sent every day."

"Every day?" Madam Jin repeated.

"I-I'm looking for my brother! He was sent here by Jin Zixun! He-he's about this tall." She raised her hand. "He doesn't talk much. Stammers whenever he has to-"

"Look, Maiden. There are so many people here. How are we supposed to remember if one of them stammers or not?"

"I know he has to be here!"

Another inspector came forward, round and chubby with an appeasing grin: "Maiden, don't worry. It's not at all uncommon for sects to come to us to ask for cultivators. Maybe one of them took him in the past couple of days."

"Ah!" Jin Guangshan straightened up at once. "See, it appears you are all well aware of what is going on here. I'm sure I only set this up with the endorsement of the other great sects."

"What?" Lan Qiren turned towards him.

"I doubt I'd have the manpower to run all this if you all didn't help," Jin Guangshan said. "It would be far too hard to keep this a secret. Besides, what reason would this inspector have to lie to Wei Wuxian?"

Frowns and glares spread throughout most of the watchers. Lan Xichen wanted to protest.

But-

'Young Master Wei's heart has changed.'

Wei Wuxian told them that Wen Ning had saved his life and then been captured unjustly. When he went to help Wen Ning, that had been Lan Xichen's reaction. At what point did 'my future self doesn't understand how bad it is' become 'my future self is, at best, willfully ignorant?'

(Nie Mingjue had shouted at Meng Yao right in front of Lan Xichen's face that Xue Yang needed to be dealt with. Instead Lan Xichen focused on Meng Yao, and, later, on the loss of Nie Mingjue. He ignored Xue Yang, who would go on to hurt civilians, Song Zizhen, Xiao Xingchen, and A-Qing in the cruelest of ways.)

The simulated Lan Xichen hadn't taken any actions that were wrong, but the real Lan Xichen was certain he didn't deserve to be sect leader if that was the best he could do.

'Do you know what's going on?' he wondered, remembering how the concern on his simulated self's face was only regarding Wei Wuxian's anger, and not the words he was saying. 'Do you know and intentionally allow this to continue? Or are you so content to just trust when the Jin Sect says 'all is well' that you won't bother to look into it yourself no matter what you hear?'

(Honestly, Lan Xichen couldn't say which option was worse.)

"You think… someone took him?" Wen Qing asked quietly.

"Ah, that's not all," another inspector jumped in. "When we do roll calls, we also sometimes find out that someone's run away."

"He wouldn't have run away! Granny and the others are all here! My brother wouldn't have run away on his own!"

And a toddler — a toddler — had been there as well.

Lan Qiren suddenly felt a memory form.

'How dare you?!' his future self had once asked, appalled by Wei Wuxian's suggestion of demonic cultivation. 'Our goal is to liberate and purify those evil spirits. You're trying to make evil fight evil? You would be reversing the natural order — completely ignoring ethics and morality!'

And yet, when true crimes against righteousness were performed, he was the one standing there, trying to intervene.

"Then… would you like to take some time and search for him?" one inspector finally suggested, his eyes going back and forth between Wen Qing and Wei Wuxian despite only speaking to her. "You can go through everyone here. If you don't find him, then there's nothing we can do about it."

"Everyone's here?" Wei Wuxian asked.

The inspectors all froze as one, some even flinching slightly at Wei Wuxian's voice.

Lan Wangji hated the fact that fear of Wei Wuxian was so widespread. However, looking again at the branding irons and whips on the inspectors' belts, he found himself grateful for it once more.

"T-that's right," one inspector said at last.

"Then, for the time being, I'll take that to mean that all the living ones are in this courtyard. So, where are the rest?"

Wen Qing felt her whole world turn to ice.

And the simulated version seemed to instantly lose all the blood in her body, becoming as white as a corpse.

"That's not it," an inspector said at once. "Although there are Wen Cultivators here, we would never allow them to experience fatal damage."

But, not listening anymore, Wei Wuxian grabbed his flute and raised it to his lips. Upon seeing that, it wasn't just the inspectors who tensed up. The prisoners who had been working nearby screamed, dropping whatever they were carrying and fleeing at once. They were trapped in the valley, but they nonetheless tried to get as far away as possible.

"In-in truth, the Wen Sect cultivators hadn't recognized Senior Wei's face," Ouyang Zizhen reported, and there was a soft sound that made it sound like he was shifting awkwardly as he said it. "Because, um, any cultivator who met Wei Wuxian on the battlefield was only met with… utter annihilation. Every Wen who could have recognized Wei Wuxian's face had become a member of his corpse army. It, um, was known among the prisoners that the flute Senior Wei carried was made of dark wood and was decorated with a crimson tassel. By unsheathing it, he had become their worst nightmare."

"It's Chenqing!"

"The ghost flute!"

"That's Chenqing?!"

The watchers remained silent as the explanation went on. They had seen what Wei Wuxian could do. Right now he was helping the Wens, but the infamy he had gained went far beyond that.

In the future, Wei Wuxian was the story parents used to scare their children into compliance. However, right now, he already was that for the Wens.

And, after a moment, Wen Ruohan looked away.

'He did so much for their side. He practically won the war for them,' he paused, glancing at Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, Jiang Cheng, and Jin Guangshan, the sect leaders at that time. 'He did everything for them, and yet the Wens aren't the only ones afraid. It couldn't be clearer that his influence turned the tide of battle time and time again and yet they ignore him, belittle him, and disregard his concerns. He's smarter than all of them combined, but no one cares what he has to say. And his own sect leader does nothing to stop this.'

He glanced around again, observing the fleeing, terrified Wen remnants and the Peony flower branding rod in the inspector's hands.

'If Wei Wuxian hadn't been loyal to the Jiangs… if he had been on my side from the beginning and we had won… if he had wanted the Jin, Lan, Jiang, or Nie prisoners I gained, I would have given them to him without hesitation. He's more than earned that.'

Instead, Wei Wuxian had been on the Jiang's side because Jiang Fengmian had been lucky enough to unknowingly pick up the world's greatest genius in his youth.

'On the other hand… perhaps, if Wei Wuxian had been on my side from the beginning, I wouldn't have started the war at all.'

Because not only would Wei Wuxian being a Wen have prevented the embarrassments that were the archery competition and the abyss, but the Yiling Patriarch was genuinely good in a way Wen Ruohan had never understood. Thus, at the news that something might have happened to Wen Ning, he didn't hesitate to take his flute out.

Resentful energy spiked.

Some watchers swallowed, feeling the command shoot through them like an electric current.

The sound ripped through the curtain of rain like an arrow piercing the night sky. It spread throughout the valley and the surrounding resentment jumped to attention.

Wei Wuxian then lowered his flute. Those few notes were more than enough.

“W-what’s that sound?” someone asked.

The cold grin on Wei Wuxian’s face widened.

Yelps of surprise came from one section of the crowd. The Wens in that area scattered, trying to get as far away as possible. They ran, kicking the surrounding puddles of water into the air with every step.

Thump.

Thump.

Something was approaching.

Jiang Yanli tensed slightly but forced herself to look on. The watchers all turned toward the source of the noise. Madam Yu felt herself reaching for where Zidian would normally be, but, upon remembering that it was gone, lowered her hand shortly after.

(After all, it couldn’t doubt Wei Wuxian's judgment. Not after everything.)

Thump.

Thump.

Thump.

A dozen tattered figures stumbled in, their once-white clothes stained black from mud and hanging by threads. But, upon closer look, that fabric wasn’t the only thing worn down. The figures’ limbs and faces were far too thin — almost torn to shreds. Or, rather, rotten.

They were corpses.

And in the front stood Wen Ning.

Abruptly, suddenly, there was a slam on the ground.

“Qing-guniang!” Jiang Yanli called out, rushing over.

Wen Qing had fallen to her knees, unable to deny but equally unable to accept what she saw before her.

There were male and female corpses, both tall and short and varying across all ages. Wen Ning’s face was so pale it looked as though it was made of wax and his pupils were dilated. His eyes were still open — frozen that way, unblinking — and no breaths left his body. Around his chest, his robes sunk in strangely. His ribs were caved in — crushed.

A flagpole with a disfigured mockery of the Wen Sect's symbol on the end went straight through his heart.

Wen Qing made a gasping sound, as though trying to speak but incapable of making any words. She reached forward with trembling hands toward her brother.

(And, of course, phased right through.)

Jiang Yanli fell to the ground, gagging, and Nie Mingjue's face became white. Jin Zixuan looked away. Nausea was rising up within him. They had seen Wen Ning alive and happy, and had laughed a little when the boy ran away from Wei Wuxian after being caught practicing his archery. Wen Ning had been lively and sweet; Jin Zixuan had wanted to be friends with him. And now….

He glanced back at the simulation, then turned away once more.

(Wen Ning was good. He didn't deserve this. But they had already known Wen Ning was going to die, so, for Jin Zixuan, the equally important concern was the age of the youngest corpse he saw there.)

(He didn't want to know.)

The simulated Wen Qing stumbled forward. She reached out, feeling for a pulse with shaking hands. As anyone in their right mind would know, there was no chance of finding one on him. She pressed again and again and again, moving her hand around as if the lack of a pulse was due to her messing up the measurement, rather than there not being one to find at all.

Eventually, the coldness of the skin she was pressing up against confirmed her fears. Collapsing to her knees, she broke into tears.

'This should not be the state the Wen Sect is in,' Wen Ruohan thought, watching with steadily growing fury. 'This should not be the state my sect is in. I… I-'

(Was powerless to change it.)

But those regrets would mean nothing to Wen Qing, who stood there uselessly — too late, far too late — and, in her hysteria, tried piecing back together Wen Ning's ribs. She was a doctor who had performed a core transfer; she could do miracles.

She could not, however, fix this.

Jin Guangshan gave a soft sigh.

'Her beautiful face is turning so ugly with those tears,' he thought. 'Dirty though she might have been earlier, she was still well-bred and attractive. Now, though, I can't see any of her former grace. Disgusting.'

If Madam Jin could hear her husband's thoughts, she would have left the simulation immediately and strangled him alive. Unfortunately, Jin Guangshan had kept quiet about them.

Though, in all honesty, Wen Qing herself probably wouldn't have cared. In front of the stiff corpse of Wen Ning, not even a fragment of the pride she had held onto was left.

"I… I'm sorry," Jin Zixuan whispered. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

But 'sorry' wouldn't bring her brother back.

Wen Qing shook her head, trying to speak, but again found herself unable to.

'No need,' she wanted to say. 'I, more than anyone, understand what it's like to feel responsible for the horrible acts your family does. You're probably as at fault for this as I was for the death of the Jiangs.'

But her brother was dead. She couldn't forgive anyone quite yet. Slowly, she glanced back at the simulation.

Wen Ning still stood there. Seeing him like this now, it became increasingly clear how different the Ghost General was from a normal corpse. The Ghost General, as unnaturally pale as he might be, was still Wen Ning.

This was just an empty carcass.

Wen Qing had failed. Her brother was gone.

Quietly, one by one, tears began to fall down her cheeks.

Nie Huaisang had reacted in a similar way upon seeing the death of his brother, and the Jiang siblings had upon watching the deaths of their parents. Slowly, they gathered around her.

(And Jin Zixuan moved back, feeling like he had no right to offer her comfort after what his sect had done.)

At that moment, overwhelmed by shock, Wen Qing passed out. Wei Wuxian caught her before she hit the ground. Standing behind her, he allowed her to lean on his chest.

Supporting each other, regardless of which of them had more power. Wen Qing and Wen Ning had helped Wei Wuxian, and Wei Wuxian would help the two of them.

The watchers looked amongst each other, unsure of what to say. Then-

"I apologize as well."

Wen Qing looked over. Lan Wangji was the one who had spoken.

"After what Wei Ying said… I should have come to help as well."

Hanguang-jun would have.

"...Thank you for saying so," Wen Qing said, unusually softly.

Wei Wuxian held the collapsed Wen Qing in his arms, closed his eyes, then opened them again.

"Who killed him?" he asked.

It was a rather toneless question. Not enough heat to be anger, but definitely lacking in warmth.

"Y-young Master Wei, you mustn't describe it that way," the head inspector said, watching Wei Wuxian nervously. "We wouldn't dare kill a single person here. He wasn't careful while working and fell deeper into the valley and died."

"Really?!" Jin Zixuan growled, unable to remain silent with what his sect was saying. "Really. Two dozen people are all dead because of 'accidents?' They only got here a few days ago!"

"Zixuan-"

"A-Die, please shut up!" he shouted.

And Wei Wuxian was similarly skeptical.

"None of you would dare kill even a single person. Really? Is that true?"

"Absolutely!"

"Not a single one!"

"Never!" the inspectors agreed in unison.

Wei Wuxian paused in thought for a moment, then smiled: "Oh, I see. It's because they're Wen-dogs, and Wen-dogs aren't people. Even if you've killed them, it doesn't count as having killed humans, huh?"

Nie Mingjue flinched at those words, feeling them stabbing at him with pinpoint accuracy.

He hadn't been at the conference in the previous scene, but his other self most certainly wouldn't have aided Wei Wuxian either.

Which, in some ways, meant he wasn't much better than the head inspector, who paled upon having his thoughts read so accurately.

Wei Wuxian shook his head, laughing lightly.

"What? Did you really think I wouldn't know how someone died?"

His eyes flashed red once more.

Realizing that the situation was turning bad for them, the inspectors began shrinking away. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, maintained his smile.

The rain continued to pour.

“It’s best if you admit everything honestly. Who killed him? Step forward on your own. I’d be willing to risk killing the wrong person if it means the perpetrator doesn’t get out of here alive.”

The inspectors paled considerably.

“If I killed you all, I could be sure that no one gets away.”

A vicious, bloodthirsty grin formed on Wen Ruohan’s face, but even Nie Mingjue didn’t try to rebuke him for it.

The head inspector stammered, “Th-the Yunmeng Jiang Sect and the Lanling Jin Sect are allies. You can’t just-”

“You’re quite brave,” Wei Wuxian observed, sounding amused. “Are you threatening me?”

Thunder rumbled in the background.

“Of course not. Of course not. Of course not.”

Jiang Wanyin stared.

Wen Ning had saved him after he lost his core protecting Wei Wuxian. Wen Qing had hidden them from Wen Chao while they were weak. Wen Ning had ventured through dangerous territory, getting his parents’ ashes and mementos back for him.

Would Jiang Yanli go to the ancestral hall so often if the ashes weren’t there?

He owed so much to them. And that was leaving aside how he’d gotten to know Wen Qing while inside the simulation. And now she knelt, mourning the loss of her sibling with tear stained eyes. Clenching his teeth, he glared at the inspector.

“Wei Wuxian, you better not let the perpetrator leave alive,” he hissed.

At that moment, Wei Wuxian laughed.

“Congratulations, you’ve successfully drained all my patience,” he declared, making the inspectors shrink back even further. “Come on. Since you won’t speak up, let’s have him answer on his own.”

The frozen corpse of Wen Ning suddenly moved, blasting forward faster than the inspectors could track and crushing the throats of the two nearest ones. Expressionless, Wen Ning raised their bodies high.

“Young Master Wei!” the inspectors tried again. “Young Master Wei, please forgive us! Doing this in the heat of the moment could lead to irreversible consequences!”

Lightning flashed in the background again.

But, at that moment, Jiang Yanli could’t help but recall the first words spoken by the simulation

“A-Xian,” she whispered. “A-Xian, stop!”

Everyone turned to stare at her in shock.

“A-Xian, just worry about the Wens! If you kill the inspectors, you’ll turn the sects against you. You die, A-Xian! You’re going to die if you do this!”

“You’re an even greater fool than I thought if you don’t think the young lady of the Jiangs is completely right,” Wen Ruohan said sharply. “He’s making it worse for himself by killing them since your sects will be able to reframe it as murder if they want to. But he’s choosing to do it anyway because enacting justice is more important to him than that. If that weren’t the case, I doubt he’d be here at all.”

‘Just like none of you are.’

Lightning flashed once more, and thunder followed shortly after. The raindrops fell heavier and heavier, trickling down Wei Wuxian’s cheeks. Then, after gritting his teeth together, Wei Wuxian spoke up:

“Wen Qionglin!”

The corpse paused.

“Whoever made you like this, let them meet the same end! I give you the right to do so! Settle everything!”

Wen Ning slammed the two inspectors he was holding together, sending their heads flying into the air.

Jin Guangshan gulped, stepping back.

Blood sprayed everywhere, and even the heavy rain couldn't wash it away completely.

Laughter escaped Wen Ruohan’s throat and his gaze fell on Wei Wuxian once more.

“Show them where they stand, Wei Ying.”

Wei Wuxian picked up Wen Qing, holding her carefully, and mounted a nearby horse.

“Young Master Wei,” a soft voice called out. Wei Wuxian glanced down and saw an elderly prisoner standing before him.

“What?”

The prisoner paused momentarily at the address, terrified by Wei Wuxian’s voice, but nonetheless forced themselves to point toward the end of the valley and said, “There’s… there’s a house over there. They… lock people inside and beat them up-”

Jin Zixuan flinched once more and Madam Jin had to look away.

“Anyone who dies is dragged outside and buried. The people you’re looking for might be over there.”

“Thank you,” Wei Wuxian said, then rode off.

He arrived at the specified house and dismounted. Holding Wen Qing in one arm, he walked over and kicked the door open. The people inside all jumped at the entrance.

And, staring at the gashes that lined their exposed skin and the unnaturally bent limbs strewn about, Jin Zixuan felt his stomach fall to the ground.

A moment later, the house’s inhabitants realized who was in Wei Wuxian’s arms.

“Maiden Qing!” some of them called out, standing up and rushing over.

“Uncle,” Wen Qing breathed out softly.

The person she’d recognized as her elderly uncle seethed: “Who… who are you?! What did you do to our Office Leader?!”

“Nothing. Who are the cultivators under Wen Ning? Step out now!”

Because he didn’t know all the Wens, and couldn’t trust them all. However, he did know that the ones under Wen Ning were taken unjustly, never having killed during the war.

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “Be careful.”

She knew she wouldn’t be able to stop him — knew it wouldn’t be right to. So she would simply ask for his safety and support him any way she could.

Wei Wuxian left, and the cultivators who had served Wen Ning had no choice but to awkwardly follow. Before they could even see what was going on, Wei Wuxian remounted his horse and gestured for them to do the same.

“Hurry up!” he ordered. “Get on!”

“No, but… our Young Master Wen Ning-”

He cut off as a head flew in front of him, several more following shortly after. Everyone looked over to see Wen Ning stomp down on a still-twitching figure on the ground. The inspector stopped moving. Wen Ning then reached down, tearing through the man's organs with his bare hands.

Jin Guangshan clutched at his own stomach again, swallowing momentarily.

"Enough!" Wei Wuxian ordered and Wen Ning froze.

A moment later, a low growl left his throat as though he was still unsatisfied.

So completely opposite the Wen Ning she knew. Wen Qing closed her eyes.

(But what Wei Wuxian had said was that he gave Wen Ning 'permission' to attack; it wasn't an order. And now he was stopping her brother. The one who changed Wen Ning into this wasn't truly Wei Wuxian, it was the inspectors Wen Ning was attacking now.)

Wei Wuxian whistled again then ordered, "Get up!"

Wen Ning stood.

At that moment, Wei Wuxian turned his attention to the living cultivators of Wen Ning's branch, shouting, "What are you waiting for?! Mount the horses! Don't tell me you want me to find you swords?!"

"You don't even have your own sword," Nie Huaisang softly pointed out. The comment went unnoticed by most of the watchers, but Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan both twitched slightly at it.

(If the core transfer was true, that was yet another factor in play in the overall situation here. Neither of them seemed very happy about it.)

Lan Wangji, who had seen their reactions, paused in thought for a moment.

The simulated figures, on the other hand, had no time for such questions. They piled onto the horses, one of them remembering last second to go back and grab the elderly woman and toddler Wei Wuxian and Wen Qing had passed earlier. Every living member of Wen Ning's branch was now there. They crammed onto the limited number of horses, seating two or three people onto one. Seeing that the elderly woman was unable to continue riding while carrying the toddler, Wei Wuxian moved closer.

"Give him to me," he commanded.

The rain still poured down harshly, soaking the young, shivering boy on her back.

To the Wens, Wei Wuxian's very name would be enough to send a shiver down their spines. He was terror incarnate for them, and the physical manifestation of their destruction. The granny tried shaking her head a few times, unwilling to hand the child over. The young boy grabbed tighter to her back, nearly slipping off in the rain.

There was an unhidden fear in their eyes.

But Wei Wuxian remained firm.

Reaching forward, Wei Wuxian picked the child up and pulled him close, away from his grandmother.

“A-Yuan!” she shouted, reaching desperately to take him back. “A-Yuan! A-Yuan!”

The child tensed, but, well-accustomed to feeling fear, did not cry. He nibbled at his fingers a little more, looking up at Wei Wuxian.

“We’re going!” Wei Wuxian shouted, his horse dashing forward first. The others forced their horses to follow after, having nothing else they could do.

The simulation drew to a close.

Although they hadn’t been able to feel the rain coming down on all sides in the simulation, they had been able to see it. With the abrupt ending to the simulation, the dark clouds and wet air were instantly replaced by the pure white walls of the in-between area — nearly blinding in their sudden appearance.

Many watchers leaned back in their chairs, going boneless from mental exhaustion. Wen Qing was surrounded by the Jiang siblings and Nie Huaisang on the floor. She appeared lost to the world, barely noticing anything around her. Nie Huaisang was quiet and pensive, thinking a few things through. Jiang Yanli was concerned, her full attention on Wen Qing, and Jiang Cheng, who had come over upon seeing his sister rush to Wen Qing, was locked in silence.

“...What was it those kids said at the beginning?” Jin Zixuan asked at last. “About… about why we were watching this?”

“You mean the future’s juniors?” Lan Qiren confirmed.

Jin Zixuan nodded but didn’t make eye contact, eyes still trained where they had seen Wei Wuxian and the Wens ride off mere moments ago.

“I understand if you’re skeptical, but please listen,” Lan Wangji recited, his memory allowing him to recall word for word what Lan Sizhui had told them two weeks ago. “In the future, numerous events will happen that will shake the cultivation world to its core. We’re trying to prevent this in your timeline by educating you all on what mistakes were made in our world, and I can assure you that each and every one of your lives was made worse by not having this information. We used a modified version of empathy on numerous spirits to create a 3D model of everything we want to show you. You won’t be able to physically interact with each other or the scenes you see, but you’ll be able to talk to each other whenever you want. We’ll be showing you things in the hope that you’ll react differently than your counterparts in our world did, mainly in terms of how they treated one person.”

Many of the watchers tensed; they all remembered the words that would come next.

“To us, this person is known by his official title as the Yiling Patriarch. To you, his name is Wei Wuxian.”

Someone laughed.

“The way they phrased it made it seem like we’d just made a few mistakes,” Lan Qiren muttered. “Not… Jin Guangshan, Sect Leader Jin, do you think you-”

“It must have been Meng Yao!” Jin Guangshan declared at once. “We’ve all seen just how good that snake is at sinking his fangs into anyone he supposedly serves. First he got rid of the Chief Cultivator, then Sect Leader Nie… now he serves me; his influence must be causing this.”

Frowning minutely, Lan Xichen pointed out, “We don’t have any evidence of that. You can’t just assume it.”

“Young Master Lan, be reasonable,” Jin Guangshan advised. “How many times have you been swayed to his side due to faulty reasoning and too much trust? I know you pity the boy, but that hardly justifies what he’s done. We’ve seen him turn on his sect leader so many times; surely we don’t need further proof than that. After all, your trust in him got Sect Leader Nie killed, didn’t it?”

Lan Xichen flinched at that. Lan Wangji frowned, about to speak up, but froze upon making eye contact with Jin Guangshan. He opened his mouth, trying to speak, but a knowing smirk from the man held his mind in a vice-like grip.

“...There was a toddler there,” Nie Mingjue whispered, stunned into near silence. “He was barely a toddler. It’s been some time since the war ended… he might have not even been born when we won. Why is he in that camp?”

“Because he’s a Wen,” Wen Ruohan pointed out easily. “What? You don’t think your other self is aware?”

“Of course not! Nothing would justify-”

“You might think that now, after watching the simulation,” the Chief Cultivator said. “Are you sure you would be feeling that way without it? No one here is the same as they were when we first entered.”

Nie Mingjue paused. He didn’t think his other self knew. He was pretty sure his other self would never support this. He was almost positive the future Nie Mingjue would have been just as enraged as Wei Wuxian if he had seen what was going on.

Almost.

And that one word carried a far heavier weight than should be possible.

“He killed the Jin disciples,” Madam Jin commented.

“They deserved it after what they did!” Wen Qing snapped, standing up again. “They deserved that and more!”

Her other self had collapsed in grief. However, despite having watched some of it, the real Wen Qing hadn’t gone through the war or the after-effects of losing. For her, anger was burning just as strongly as her grief.

“I agree,” Madam Jin admitted, softly. “I agree. But what A-Li said about how that might turn the sects against Wei Wuxian is true too. If he could have gotten the Wens out without killing them…”

“If someone is after his Stygian Tiger Seal then they’ll pin it against him regardless,” Lan Wangji disagreed. “There’s no reason for Wei Ying to not enact vengeance if he’s going to take the Wens and run. Besides, this is much like the cave of the Xuanwu of Slaughter. Stopping the Wens then had a chance of bringing the Jiangs trouble. He did it anyway.”

(And saved your son in the process.)

The first scene in the simulation itself flashed into their minds again:

‘Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian is dead!’

‘Really? Who killed him?’

‘Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, leader of the Jiang Clan!’

Jiang Cheng clenched his fists together.

‘If so, serves him right,’ the civilian said, clearly knowing nothing about Wei Wuxian at all.

“What’s going to happen now? Where are they going to go?” Jiang Yanli asked. “I-I mean… A-Cheng, you’ll help, won’t you?”

“Of course-”

Jiang Cheng's words were cut off by a twitch of resentful energy.

“Greetings honorable Sect Leaders,” Wei Wuxian said teasingly. The few conversations he’d had with them had involved the Sect Leaders being surprisingly casual around him. Subconsciously, he was starting to match the atmosphere.

He was relaxed. Around them.

After what they’d just seen, such cheer felt like a slap in the face.

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered softly. “How… how are you?”

“I’m alright,” Wei Wuxian responded easily. “Are you okay Shijie?”

He had instantly picked up on her muted tone.

“Did someone do something?”

And, with the way he said ‘someone,’ it was instantly clear that he was referring to Jin Zixuan.

“No!” Jiang Yanli said at once. “No. No, A-Xian. It wasn’t him.”

“It might as well have been,” Jin Zixuan grumbled. “It was my sect that-”

“That isn’t your fault,” Nie Huaisang disagreed. “Now, on the other hand, if you knowingly took part in this, then the situation changes.”

But as of yet, they had no reason to believe he knew what was going on.

“...Is that… something I should know about?” Wei Wuxian asked, thoroughly lost.

Madam Yu sighed, practically collapsing in her chair with an unusual display of impropriety: “We’ll explain later, Wei Wuxian. There’s… too much to go into now.”

“...If you say so,” he accepted. “Ah, I wanted to mention, I tracked down Meng Yao.”

There was a pause.

“What?!”

“Yeah. He’ll be working for me for a bit. Mo Xuanyu — the future one, I mean — said I should get to know him a bit and draw my own conclusions. So long as I know ahead of time that I should be on guard, I’ll probably be able to control the situation,” Wei Wuxian explained. “Though apparently this is mostly the doing of Nie-xiong’s future self.”

“Me?!” Nie Huaisang asked, jumping at the sudden address.

“Yeah. Supposedly, you convinced Mo Xuanyu to trust me a little more. I’m so touched!”

“Hm,” Nie Huaisang said, fiddling with his hands nervously. “W-well, at least we know where he is now.”

(It was always easier to set a trap if you knew where the snake you were hunting lived.)

“Be careful!” Nie Mingjue advised. “He’s got a silver tongue. How are you going to keep track of him?”

“He’s working as my secretary now. He’s trying to help me track down that ‘Xue Yang’ you mentioned.”

Wen Ruohan wasn’t used to owing people. After what had just happened, however, he couldn’t help but feel like he did.

(Meng Yao was a similar kind of person to him. Talented, driven, and admittedly quite selfish all the while. He had apparently taken to Wen Ruohan’s lessons on torture like a fish to water. Wei Wuxian, despite having many similar qualities, would never do that.)

(But it was those differing qualities which had led Meng Yao to betray him, and had led Wei Wuxian to save the Wens.)

Wei Wuxian was good in a way neither Meng Yao nor Wen Ruohan were. And, because of that, Wen Ruohan owed him more than words could describe.

“Wei Ying, be careful of him,” the Chief Cultivator said at last, not even noticing that he was just repeating Nie Mingjue.

“...I suppose you’ve seen quite a bit of him in the simulation,” Wei Wuxian guessed. “I’ll take your words under advisement, Your Excellency.”

(The sudden switch from his courtesy name to his given name was a little weird, but given how much older Wen Ruohan was than him it wasn’t too disrespectful. Wei Wuxian decided to ignore it).

“I’ll update you all if he does anything I’m uncertain about. You might be able to give me more context.)

Wen Ruohan nodded once, but remained otherwise silent.

Jin Guangshan, meanwhile, licked his lips.

‘Every time we see the Yiling Patriarch in action I’m somehow still surprised by how powerful he is,’ Sect Leader Jin thought, glancing up like Wen Ruohan had. ‘And this version in our world… he knows none of this. He’s so ignorant of what’s to come.’

A smile formed on Jin Guangshan’s face.

(And Lan Wangji, who was still watching, shivered at the sight.)

A cold wind blew, and Sect Leader Jiang’s annoyance caused Zidian to spark strongly.

“He’s not here?!” Jiang Cheng repeated, glaring at the Lan disciple before him in disbelief. “After I came all this way?”

“Sorry, Sect Leader Jiang,” Lan Jingyi said, not sounding sorry at all. “If you’d sent a message beforehand to say you were coming, maybe Senior Wei would have made himself available. I suppose you'll just have to wait for him to return."

"Hm." Jiang Cheng took a deep breath and Zidian sparked once more. "And… how long did you say Wei Wuxian's little… excursion would take?"

"Oh, Senior Wei and Hanguang-jun are night hunting together, so it could take anywhere from a few hours to a few weeks. They often spend some of the time just relaxing together in the inns. You know how it is."

Jiang Wanyin shivered in disgust at the image that provoked, his glare turning even more harsh. Unfortunately, Lan Jingyi seemed far too pleased by his annoyance.

"You could wait in here until they return," he offered, as was proper. "Lan Qiren-xiansheng will keep you company. Or, of course, you could always just leave and come back later!"

With the way he phrased it, it was clear which option he preferred. It was a long distance between Yunmeng and the Cloud Recesses, but with his core ~~from Wei Wuxian~~ Jiang Cheng would be able to make the trip again without too much trouble.

However, now that Lan Jingyi had phrased it that way, leaving was the last thing Jiang Cheng wanted to do.

"I'll stay then," he declared through gritted teeth. "It would be an honor to catch up with Lan-xiansheng."

Not even trying to hide his disappointment at Jiang Wanyin's response, Lan Jingyi begrudgingly began bringing him to a tea room where Lan Qiren was waiting. They went up the steps together and entered a large building. The halls they walked through were sparsely decorated (as with every room in the Lan Sect) and emphasized humility and grace over extravagance. A few carvings on the birch wood pillars was as close as it got to liveliness.

It was the opposite of everything Wei Wuxian was and the last place he should want to be.

(And yet, time and time again, Wei Wuxian had chosen to stay here.)

Internally, Jiang Cheng cursed his nephew again.

'I should never have come,' he thought. 'What was A-Ling thinking telling me to head over here? I don't need to apologize to Wei Wuxian. My reaction to his stupid time travel invention was perfectly logical! This is just how he always is, thinking he knows what's best for everyone. Always too much thought in and ruining it all.'

He felt at his lower stomach subconsciously. Wei Wuxian's core seemed to glow brighter in response.

Finally, they made it to the room Lan Qiren was in. Lan Jingyi opened the door then left without so much as a bow of respect. Jiang Cheng would really need to have words with Lan Qiren about him.

With a bow of greeting of his own, Jiang Wanyin entered the room. He sat down across from Lan Qiren, accepting the other man's offered tea. Steam rose off the cup he was handed, obscuring his and Lan Qiren's views of each other momentarily.

"I hope you had a safe journey, Sect Leader Jiang," the man said.

"It was fine," Jiang Cheng responded. "I see the Cloud Recesses are doing as well as ever."

There was a pause as they both took a sip of tea.

Jiang Cheng placed the cup on the table, waving his hand to clear away the steam.

"I hope I'm not taking up too much of your time," he commented.

They were empty words, but expected nonetheless.

"Not at all," Lan Qiren responded. "In fact, my previous arrangement with Sect Leader Nie was canceled shortly before you arrived."

"Was it?"

"Yes," Lan Qiren admitted. "About two minutes before it was meant to begin, a messenger from the Nie Sect came to inform me that his sect leader had seen a bird he wanted to catch on the way to the Cloud Recesses, chased after it, and promptly fell into a ditch and sprained his ankle. It appears our meeting will need to be postponed."

Jiang Cheng really wished he could say he was surprised.

Both men brought their teas up again.

"I hear you want to see Wei Wuxian," Lan Qiren commented. "Has something gone wrong that requires that boy's assistance?"

(Or had he done something wrong that Jiang Cheng would need to confront him about?)

"It's not sect business," was Jiang Cheng's only response. "...I hear Sect Leader Nie has taken charge of the wedding?"

A look of displeasure flashed across Lan Qiren's face, but he only said, "Indeed. How did you know?"

"He asked me to send some purple dye to help prepare," Jiang Cheng scoffed. "For free!"

'Technically, since he's offering to give you and Wei Wuxian a chance to make up in exchange for the dye. It's not for free' Jin Ling's voice pointed out. Jiang Cheng ignored him as steadily as always.

"Feel no pressure," Lan Qiren said instead. "I'm sure we'll manage just fine without the dye."

“Appreciated.”

They both drank from their cups once more.

“...How did he end up in charge?” Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but ask. It was a wedding between the Yiling Patriarch — who was essentially a rogue cultivator — and the second young master of the Lan Sect. Why would the Sect Leader of the Nie be getting involved?

“It was Wei Wuxian’s decision. Wangji went along with it,” Lan Qiren responded, not bothering to hide the bitterness in his expression. He refilled his cup of tea and took another drink.

‘Ah. I bet this has something to do with how Wei Wuxian asked for Sect Leader Nie’s help with the time travel mess he made,’ Jiang Cheng thought. ‘I have no idea why he’d ask the Headshaker for help, but there’s always some deeper plan involved, isn’t there? Wei Wuxian’s just too smart to tell anyone what’s going on, huh? He’s the only one who can handle it, so why bother informing others? Even his husband’s uncle doesn’t know! And I’m sure whatever he’s using Nie Huaisang for is already all planned out and will keep my stupid past self from doing things wrong. Why would he ever trust others? I bet he thinks no one could possibly know what to do better than as he does!’

His hands clenched his cup even tighter.

“Yeah,” Sect Leader Jiang laughed. “That sounds like Wei Wuxian, all right.”

Lan Qiren nodded: “It’s how he always acts.”

“Why are we still surprised? Of course he hasn’t explained anything.”

“Indeed. That’s just like him.”

And at that moment, so swept up in their annoyance at Wei Wuxian, the two of them spoke simultaneously:

“He always has to control everything!”

“He never thinks anything through!”

They paused, doing a double take toward each other.

“...Ah, right,” Jiang Wanyin agreed, trying to get back on the same track. “He never thinks about… talking to us.”

A beat of awkwardness passed, and both reached down to take another sip of tea.

(To Lan Qiren, the most recent incident on his mind was when Wei Wuxian and the juniors took a look at what the people in the simulation were watching. After whatever they had seen, Wei Wuxian fell into a panic attack. That incident certainly hadn't appeared to be the result of careful planning.)

Jiang Cheng cleared his throat: "...Your nephew agreed to having Sect Leader Nie run the wedding too?"

"Ah, yes," Lan Qiren nodded. "Wangji and Wei Wuxian informed me about the matter together. They often only come to me once they've already reached an agreement on things. Or been pushed into it by the other."

Jiang Cheng frowned, looking around again at the Cloud Recesses. The bland white walls were the antithesis of everything Wei Wuxian was but the embodiment of Lan Wangji. He still couldn't believe Wei Wuxian was happy living here. On the other hand, Lan Wangji was his protector now ~~instead of Jiang Cheng.~~ Maybe Wei Wuxian hated it, but would go along with anything Lan Wangji said.

Jin Guangyao laughed: 'Sect Leader Jiang, if only your attitude toward your shixiong was just a bit better, showing everyone that your bond was too strong to be broken, or if you'd exhibited just a bit more tolerance after what happened, things wouldn't have become what they were.'

Wei Wuxian would still have an option outside of Lan Wangji.

"And people think it's a 'perfect relationship,'" Jiang Cheng muttered before he could stop himself. "It's more unbalanced than the relationship between the four great sects and the Wens was."

Jiang Cheng tensed a moment later. He hadn't meant to say that to Lan Wangji's own uncle. However, to his surprise, the man just nodded.

"I wasn't expecting to find someone who agreed with me," Lan Qiren admitted. "I haven't found anyone else who does."

"Well, the truth is plain to see."

"It is," Lan Qiren pursed his lips. "How can anyone be okay with one side having that much power over the other?"

"It's like he can't even speak out against him."

"Absolutely."

"Is there anything I can do?" Jiang Cheng asked. "I wasn't expecting you to agree with me either, but if you also see that your nephew has too much power in the relationship-"

"My nephew has too much power?" Lan Qiren repeated. "Weren't we discussing how Wei Wuxian is controlling his every move?"

"We were?"

They stared at each other again, then quickly grabbed their teas and took a long drink to fill the silence. They set the cups down and Lan Qiren refilled them with the last of the tea.

"...Your nephew, Sect Leader Jin, has been coming over frequently," Lan Qiren said, shifting the conversation to a place he hoped would be free from contradiction.

"Ah, yes. He has become close with some of your sect's juniors."

"I see. I'm glad we can continue our sects' good relations. Perhaps, if the opportunity arises, I can take that group night hunting in Yunmeng. With the Ouyang kid, too."

Lan Qiren nodded: "I'm sure that would be a valuable experience. Certainly much preferable to their usual guides."

Although neither said it out loud, Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning's faces appeared in their minds.

"You would think A-Ling would avoid him after everything he's done."

Because, regardless of the circumstances, it was Wen Ning's blow that killed Jin Zixuan.

(And it was Wen Ning who revealed to him what had happened to Wei Wuxian's core.)

Lan Qiren frowned: "I told them not to travel with him, but it appears no one in this sect cares much for my opinions anymore. Perhaps you could try to guide at least your nephew away from him."

"I did try," Jiang Cheng said, glaring at his tea. "It took him less than a day to disobey me."

Lan Qiren clicked his tongue, disappointed but unsurprised.

"I can't believe this. He's a fierce corpse," Jiang Cheng pointed out with a laugh. Wen Qionglin was a fierce corpse, meaning he was at the Yiling Patriarch's beck and call. And the truth behind his core meant that, even before becoming a fierce corpse, Wen Ning was on Wei Wuxian's side. He was one of the ways Wei Wuxian got the world to work the way he wanted it to and was a tool Wei Wuxian used against Jiang Cheng — against Jin Zixuan — time and time again.

In Jiang Cheng's mind, he was little more than an extension of Wei Wuxian's will to-

"Yes, Wei Wuxian's a fool if he thinks he can control the Ghost General."

Jiang Wanyin paused, blinking at Lan Qiren.

The Lan elder stared back.

"...Wen Qionglin has sentience, so it's up to him whether he listens to Wei Wuxian or not," Lan Qiren pointed out, speaking slowly as if not understanding Jiang Cheng's confusion. "And, from what I heard, what happened to Jin Zixuan was a result of Wei Wuxian losing control. Him being around the juniors is dangerous because Wei Wuxian may not be able to stop him. Yes?"

Jiang Cheng kept staring and Lan Qiren stared back. They both then, simultaneously, lifted their teas and finished the cups.

"...Maybe I'll return another day," Jiang Cheng offered.

"Yes, that would… probably be for the best."

Some time later, a few hundred miles away, a certain Sect Leader Nie gave a content sigh.

"Ahh," breathed out, sinking deeper into his bath and practically melting into the water. He almost appeared to have turned into a jellyfish with how boneless he became, the warm water shutting off his mind.

"Sect Leader Nie!" a voice called out from the other side of the screen.

"Hm?" Nie Huaisang wondered, not present enough to give a verbose answer.

"Sect Leader Jiang and Lan-xiansheng's conversation went exactly as you hoped it would. They are both reconsidering their viewpoints and giving Wei Wuxian's actions more thought."

"Fantastic," he mumbled sleepily. "My wedding gift is about halfway finished then."

There was a pause as the servant of the Nie considered his next words.

"Sir, are you… are you sure it's a good idea to try to manipulate two of the most influential people in the world for the sake of a wedding gift?"

"Sure. Mooching off the emotional turmoil of others is 90% of the work I do these days. And to think Da-ge once told me I wouldn't be able to be sect leader without putting some actual sword practice in. Ha! Shows him!"

The Nie Clan's servant sighed.

'I wonder if it's too late to suggest to the Yiling Patriarch that he should try to make someone else into Chief Cultivator.'

(Unfortunately, it probably was.)

Ignored, Not Unheard

Chapter Notes

> I am warning you now that I will be a tiny bit extra mean to Jiang Cheng in the following chapter. Jin Guangshan is also a creep, but that's not anything new. If that's something that will bother you please proceed with caution! Also, as per usual, beta read by Tintin!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The moon rose high in the night sky, sending slivers of light down onto a quiet village. The small collection of homes, far away from any other civilization, stood surrounded on all sides by rice paddies and lakes. Within the territory of the Yunmeng Jiang Clan, this was far from an unusual sight.

What was unusual, however, was the guest they had.

"We greet the Sect Leader of the Jiang Clan!" the villagers shouted from all around, raising a toast in his honor. Jiang Cheng nodded once before taking a drink, scowling the whole time. Really, there was no reason for him to be there at all.

(Except that this village had some of the best dyers in the district, and Nie Huaisang had requested a few dozen elaborate table cloths for Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji's wedding.)

Jiang Cheng sighed.

"Chang Fang, go speak to the village elder about our trade offer," Jiang Cheng ordered, causing one of the disciples to his right to bow and scurry off. If all went well, this deal could be finalized without any further actions on Jiang Cheng's part.

Once again, he found himself wondering why he hadn't just sent a representative to handle this.

(However, after the strange conversation he had with Lan Qiren, some part of Jiang Cheng felt like doing this himself. Getting out of the sect for a while seemed good.)

"Sect Leader, would you like another cup?" a middle aged woman to Jiang Chong's right asked, holding up a jar that could refill it. Jiang Cheng began to shoo her off, only to hesitate at the last second and nod instead.

Liquor was poured in.

"I hope you enjoy," the woman said. "My family has been brewing for generations."

Jiang Cheng said nothing as he drank, but the woman's gray eyes seemed to glow with pride regardless. A crackle of purple lightning flashed — unnoticed, thanks to the loud party — around Jiang Cheng's lowered hand.

~~What were the chances that both Wei Wuxian and Mo Xuanyu would be born with irises the exact same shade of silver? Jiang Cheng had never even seen that on anyone else! What a disgusting, unnatural color.~~

All around, there was an almost physical cheer in the air. A small village like this had never received anyone so important as a guest before. Their enthusiasm was palpable.

And, as more and more alcohol was consumed, their tongues became loose.

"The Sect Leader of the Jiang Sect has come to get things dyed by us! Ha! I told A-Ping we were better at it than those Southern Mountain folks!" a round, elderly man bragged.

"Father, what are you getting so proud about? You've never touched dye in your life!" the gray-eyed woman scolded as she walked over to her family.

But her father was undeterred, wrapping an arm around the shoulders of the man next to him as he responded, "My son in law is in the business. I have every right to be proud!"

The strength with which Jiang Cheng held his cup made small cracks begin to form.

"You better drink up!" the father told his son in law, refilling his cup. "Tonight is partly about you! And you'll have your work cut out for you in the coming weeks!"

"They haven't even decided on a date for the wedding yet!" the son in law pointed out.

At the mention of 'the wedding,' Jiang Cheng felt Zidian crackle once more.

This time, it was just loud enough to be heard. Although most of the party didn't seem to notice, both husband and wife looked over at him with wary eyes. Quickly picking up on his mood, they changed the subject:

"Father, did I tell you about the decorated clasp A-Fan managed to make? His metalworking abilities have gotten much better in recent years!"

"You didn't tell me! I haven't managed to see hide or hair of my grandson in weeks! Has he been locking himself up in that workshop of his?"

"He has," the gray eyed woman confirmed. "Apparently he's working hard on a big project…"

Their conversation continued but Jiang Cheng tuned them out. That turned out to be a mistake, however, as most everyone else was talking about the world's most anticipated wedding.

"A-Niang, A-Niang, how much longer until then?"

“They haven’t decided yet, I don’t think.”

“They have to find an auspicious date,” someone pointed out. “This is going to be the wedding of the century. I’m sure the sects are planning it carefully. It’s the Chief Cultivator and the Yiling Patriarch, after all.”

Actually, “the sects” weren’t doing much planning at all. Lan Xichen was barely peeking his head out of his self-imposed seclusion, Lan Qiren didn’t want the wedding at all, Lan Wangji was busy being Chief Cultivator, Wei Wuxian was dealing with the other dimension, Jin Ling was learning how to be Sect Leader, and Jiang Cheng was only doing this under duress. A vast majority of the planning was being left to Nie Huaisang, who (in Jiang Cheng’s humble opinion) was the last person who should be in charge of anything.

Though Wei Wuxian wouldn’t care what Jiang Cheng thought.

(Once, he and Wei Wuxian had been certain they would be in charge of planning Jiang Yanli’s wedding. When that time actually came, Wei Wuxian hadn’t even been invited. Depending on how things went, that pattern might repeat itself in reverse for the coming one.)

(Nie Huaisang had claimed he would handle things so long as Jiang Cheng took care of the dye, but, considering who had made that promise, Jiang Cheng felt justified in being a little skeptical.)

Of course, unaware of all that, the villagers’ conversations continued on:

“I bet the decorations will be gorgeous!”

“And can you even imagine the food?”

“Yeah! There’ll probably be enough there to feed an army! And it’ll be of a quality fit for the emperor!”

“Eh? I thought the Yiling Patriarch and Chief Cultivator wanted a quiet wedding. With just a few guests?”

An elderly woman scoffed, explaining, “A ‘few guests’ for us and ‘a few guests’ for them are not the same thing. Any Sect Leader that’s not invited will view it as a personal affront! And, considering what they’ve done under Jin Guangyao’s rule…”

Sounds of understanding came from all around. The Yiling Patriarch had been found to be good, and all the sects were now supporting that story. However, the fact remained that the Yiling Patriarch had been public enemy number 1 for decades, and the sects had acted accordingly. Thus, the only logical conclusion was that the evil Jin Guangyao had tricked them into hating him.

(And if a sect leader were to not be invited to the wedding, it would seem to indicate that the Yiling Patriarch was not in agreement about it being all Jin Guangyao’s fault. Wei Wuxian might be binding himself to Hanguang-jun, their honorable Chief Cultivator, but there was only so much risk the sects could take. Any Sect Leader powerful enough to have done something against him during the last 13 years would have to receive an invitation to come.)

Jiang Cheng wondered how Jiang Yanli would have felt if she could have known what Wei Wuxian's wedding would turn into.

Before he even registered what he was doing, Jiang Cheng had slammed his cup down on the table before him. Everyone in the party swerved toward Jiang Cheng at once, their earlier conversations vanishing. The gray eyed woman and her husband looked especially nervous about this move. In the sudden silence, Jiang Cheng stood up.

"I'm going for a walk," he announced.

"Ah, I'll guide you," the gray-eyed woman offered, standing up as well. "Our lakes may be nothing in comparison to your Pier's, but we have a few Koi Ponds that I hope you'll enjoy."

As she guided Jiang Cheng out, the more sober guests seemed to breathe out sighs of relief. It was inevitable that being in Jiang Cheng's presence would be nerve wracking, but the complete faith they had in his guide's ability was obvious. The only one who looked nervous was her husband, who stood up to follow only to be pulled back down by his (very drunk) father-in-law a moment later.

Paying that no mind, the gray-eyed woman guided him out.

"If you look to your right, you can see some of the maple trees we have," she explained, gesturing toward them. "They don't have many leaves right now, but in a few weeks this entire grove will be bright red."

The Sect Leader said nothing in response but she made no indication she took any offense.

They walked over a bridge, hearing rushing water flow through underneath.

"The Koi Ponds are quite beautiful. My husband and I got married here, in fact. My younger son loves the area, and I think my older one wanted to get married here too," she explained, smiling nostalgically. "He loved showing his fiancée all around."

"...Loved?" Jiang Cheng asked. The woman paused, surprised at his question, and Jiang Cheng found himself surprised too. He didn't really want to know but, swept up in the conversational aura she exuded, he had found himself asking nonetheless.

"He passed away a few years ago," she admitted at last. "An accident. We... loved him very much."

Jiang Cheng had never heard his own mother say such a thing. An open expression of affection like that felt wrong and foreign. Nothing even resembling those words had ever come out of Madam Yu's mouth.

Jiang Yanli would probably have said something like that if she had been allowed to see Jin Ling grow up.

(Might still be able to, in the parallel world Wei Wuxian had created — and wasn't that a strange thought.)

"Ah, here we are."

Jiang Cheng looked up.

In the grounds before him, a crystal clear pond rested calmly. Encircling the pool was a forest of maple trees burning bright red. In the shadows of the trees, fireflies flitted about, giving the lake a white glow.

Then, from the bushes, there was a rustle.

"A-Fan?" the gray eyed woman asked, rushing over. "What are you doing here? You should be in bed."

"Sorry," was the mumbled response.

"Who's this?" Jiang Cheng asked, vaguely recognizing the name.

"Ah, Sect Leader, let me introduce you. This is my second son, A-Fan."

The fourteen or fifteen year old boy bowed once. With his face lowered, his eyes were hidden behind the shadows of his long bangs. Jiang Cheng was glad; he didn't want to take the risk of seeing another set of gray eyes.

"…It's fine," Jiang Cheng said at last, unusually subdued. "My nephew is about his age, too."

The woman smiled, relaxing at his answer.

Then, softly, the boy spoke.

"You're the sect leader of the Jiang Sect?"

His mother frowned at the question, commanding, "A-Fan, go back. Let me talk to-"

"Are you the Sect Leader of the Jiang Clan?!" the boy asked again.

"I am," Jiang Cheng admitted.

"A-Fan!" his mother hissed sharply. "Go back."

Then, frowning petulantly, A-Fan protested, "I wanted to meet Sect Leader Jiang. It's not fair that I don't get to when everyone else in the village gets to see him."

With the exception of Jin Ling, kids weren't really Jiang Cheng's thing. He looked away, trying his hardest to ignore the snot-nosed brat in front of him. Luckily, at that moment, someone else arrived.

"Ah, there you are!" a man shouted from behind him. The gray-eyed woman's husband rushed over, having finally managed to escape his father in law. Jiang Cheng relaxed in relief, sure that, now that the father was here, one of the parents would be able to take the kid away and he'd no longer be Jiang Cheng's problem. He turned back to the gray-eyed woman, ready to ask her to take him to their next stop.

Which was why Jiang Cheng was able to see the flash of silver before it made contact with him.

"Ah-!"

"A-Fan?"

Both parents looked over at once, only to see their son being held aloft by a crushing grip on his wrist, his legs flailing underneath.

"Sect Leader, what are you doing?!"

"Sect Leader Jiang, please put him down!" the woman rushed over. "I… what are you-"

Jiang Cheng clenched down, snapping the child's wrist.

The scream that followed kicked the father into gear.

"Let him go!" the man shouted, running over. He reached up, ready to pull his son from Jiang Cheng's hold, only to pause at the last second when he saw a flash of light fall to the ground. Upon closer inspection, its source became obvious. A knife had fallen out of A-Fan's hand.

(A newly-forged one, made by an amateur in metalworking.)

"What's this?" Jiang Cheng asked, unamused. "If you were all working together to kill me then you better admit it fast. I'm not in a very forgiving mood."

Zidian sparked by his side. If that hand had been the one he was using to hold A-Fan up, electricity would have surged through the child's body. The unnatural purple glow lit the water of the Koi Pond, drowning out the reflection of the moon.

"Wait! Wait, Sect Leader. Wait!" The gray-eyed woman dropped to her knees. "I-I swear to you, that isn't the case!"

She bowed lowly, and her husband did the same.

"Please, spare him! You-you must have made a mistake. My son would never-"

"You think I can't tell when someone wants me dead?!" Jiang Cheng snarled back. "A brat like this-"

"It was nothing you don't deserve!" A-Fan shouted.

"What are you-"

"Be quiet, A-Fan!" his father shouted.

But the child just growled once more.

“You have no right to come here! We don’t need you! Just get out! Go away! You’ve done enough damage!”

“I apologize, Sect Leader. We’ve educated him wrong. He doesn’t know what he’s talking about!”

“Clearly,” Jiang Cheng scoffed.

But, through his tears, the boy managed to hiss out, “I know enough to know that you killed my brother!”

Jiang Cheng paused, looking at the child blankly. His anger was still there but, now, confusion was overtaking him. That confusion was doubled by the fact that, for the first time, the boy’s parents seemed unable to contradict him.

“...I’ve never been to this village before,” Jiang Cheng pointed out.

“Not here! He… he… Gege was headed to the Southern Mountain. His fiancee was there! He was going to his fiancee. The-there was a wagon he was riding over on. He covered it in bright red paint. He’d painted all over it himself! In characters! It was a note for his fiancee! Don’t you remember?!”

The words were nearly incomprehensible through the boy’s tears, but Jiang Cheng got the basic point. He scoffed.

“How am I supposed to know what your brother’s carriage had on it? You think I care what a random brat was heading off to do? Whatever happened to him is none of my business. You, on the other-”

“But it was you! You have to remember! Because-because they said you saw his carriage! You saw him — you saw the red characters he had written down and decided it was for demonic cultivation!”

Jiang Cheng froze.

Subconsciously, he noticed the gray eyed woman trembling at the words.

“It wasn’t demonic cultivation! It wasn’t! He hadn’t done anything wrong! But you didn’t care! You said that only Wei Wuxian would do demonic cultivation so openly! So you took Gege back to Lotus Pier and whipped him to death!!!”

The loud scream cut through the open field, scaring birds in the surrounding trees into flying away. Jiang Cheng wanted to snap back — wanted to write this off as baseless accusations — wanted to show the brat the consequences of his actions — but…

~~But, suddenly, he was unsure.~~

~~Had he done this?~~

“Everyone says the same thing,” A-Fan began anew. “Everyone agrees. Sect Leader Jiang sees ghosts everywhere! He’ll accuse anyone of being a demonic cultivator!”

Jiang Cheng gritted his teeth together, snapping, “If I did accuse him then I was probably right!”

“You weren’t! You weren’t! My brother just wanted to see Ming-jie! That was it! He never did anything wrong! You attacked him over nothing! Why?! Why?! Why do you always go after demonic cultivators?! Why do you always get normal people caught up in your vengeance?!”

“I-”

“Shut up! Shut up! Shut up!” A-Fan shrieked. “Shut up! Everyone knows that half the people you bring back to torture in your sect haven’t done anything! More than half! None of them have done anything! And you — and you — you killed my brother because he reminded you of Wei Wuxian, but now you want to help with Wei Wuxian's wedding?! What gives you the right?!”

“I don’t make guesses!” Jiang Cheng shouted back, Zidian sparking by his side again. “If I captured him for that then he was a demonic cultivator! You clearly didn’t know a single thing about your brother-”

“He wasn’t he wasn’t he wasn’t!” the child shouted back. “He never was! You deserve to die!”

The hate in his words, for a moment, reminded Jiang Cheng of how Jin Ling had sounded whenever he talked about Wei Wuxian, prior to actually meeting him. There was a level of desperation and hate that was hard to find in people his age. Jiang Cheng only saw it in Jin Ling when his nephew stabbed Wei Wuxian that fateful day at Koi Tower. A child filled with too much bitterness and hate for the few years they had lived. It was even more than that, actually. Jin Ling’s expression had turned regretful immediately after he did that; A-Fan’s hatred seemed to have no end.

But Wei Wuxian had actually killed Jin Ling’s family-

And Jiang Cheng might have killed this kid’s.

(What was almost worse was that the situation A-Fan had described matched so many incidents in Jiang Cheng’s memory that he genuinely couldn't say for sure.)

Suddenly, someone clutched at the side of his robes.

“Please… please show mercy, Sect Leader,” the gray-eyed woman whispered. “Please. A-Fan doesn’t know any better. I swear, he doesn’t mean it.”

“We beg your forgiveness,” the father agreed, prostrating himself on the floor.

Jiang Cheng paused.

"...Is what he's saying a lie?" he asked. "How did your eldest son actually die?"

"A building caught fire!"

"A carriage accident!"

Both husband and wife had spoken at the exact same time, not realizing the other would speak too. Therefore, neither response could be true.

Zidian crackled once more.

"Don't touch my parents!" the child screamed.

"A-Fan, be quiet!" his father shouted, scrambling desperately for excuses. "Sir — Sect Leader — it's true that my eldest son died away from us. It was while he was visiting his fiancee, so we weren't there. We don't know what happened! Everyone in the village was told he died in an accident! Someone must have filled my son's mind with lies against you out of jealousy for your constant patronage of your village-"

"And you think that would excuse your son trying to kill me?" Jiang Cheng wondered.

"Forgive us!" the gray eyed woman pleaded. "Forgive us. Please."

The father clutched at his robes as well, begging, "Sect Leader-"

"Quiet," Jiang Cheng hissed. "Next time one of you talks, I'll stop holding back."

He turned his attention to the child once more.

"Who told you I was involved? If you can give me a name, I'll let you and your family go free."

But, despite Jiang Cheng's shockingly generous offer, the kid couldn't speak a word, crying too loudly for anything to be heard. The rage he was feeling was being overwhelmed by the sheer terror Jiang Cheng sparked within him. Even the pleading gazes of his parents did nothing to calm the kid's cries. Then, through A-Fan's sobs, a strange laughter began to appear.

"I hate you," he whispered. "I hate you. I hate you. Yeah, everyone in the village would say he died in an accident! That's because my parents never told them the truth! Everyone knows you target innocent people, but no one's willing to risk angering you here! But I know! I do! A member of your sect told us! They brought us back the jade necklace Ming-jie gave him! Don't you dare tell me I'm wrong! You killed my brother!"

"You little-!" Jiang Cheng clenched his fist, sending lightning sparking up his arm. The sight made the tears on A-Fan's face double in intensity but his words continued on.

"You… Just leave! Go back to the Yiling Patriarch's wedding! Go and celebrate like you never did anything! Gege's already dead! He's never coming back! And you get to keep on living like nothing happened! Leave us and go! You've already taken everything from my family! Are you happy now?!"

'Well?! Have you seen the result of you playing hero? Are you happy now?!' Jiang Cheng had screamed, once upon a time. Wei Wuxian had gagged, suffocating under Jiang Cheng's hands — under the chokehold Jiang Cheng had on him. And, looking back on what happened after, Wei Wuxian had deserved it. He would go on to kill Jiang Cheng's entire family. He had killed Jin Zixuan; he had killed Jiang Yanli; he had gotten Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian killed, too.

At that thought, he could feel his sister frowning at him.

'You know that isn't true,' she whispered.

But it was true. That was why Wei Wuxian never did anything to punish Jin Ling for stabbing him. He knew full well that he deserved it. He knew he had killed Jin Ling's parents and grandparents. He knew that giving Jiang Cheng his core was nowhere near enough to make up for everything he had taken from them-

"Go to hell!" A-Fan whispered, sobbing some more. "You should just…"

'They all should just go to hell!' Jiang Cheng screamed.

Suddenly, Jiang Cheng's other hand snapped forward as well, grabbing onto A-Fan's neck. He squeezed, hoping to permanently silence the brat — to just make those memories stop. A-Fan choked under his grip, kicking his legs and clawing at Jiang Cheng's hands with little effect.

"Stop!" his mother screamed, pushing past Jiang Cheng's warning to pull at his arm. The father soon did the same, but neither managed to make any dent on the cultivator before them.

(Of course they couldn't. Anyone who had ~~Wei Wuxian's~~ core would be unstoppable in a situation like this.)

"Sect Leader Jiang!"

The sobbing, choking brat opened his eyes. He stared at Jiang Cheng, terror clear in his expression.

He, like Wei Wuxian, had inherited his mother's eyes.

That damn shade of gray stared into Jiang Cheng's soul.

Silver eyes looked back, not doing anything to stop Jiang Cheng from choking him so long as he was the only one being hurt.

And, at that moment, Jiang Cheng let go.

“Ah!” the kid yelled, falling to the ground. Jiang Cheng’s arm was instantly released, the boy’s parents rushing to his side.

“Sect Leader,” the father said, positioning himself so he was between his family and Jiang Cheng. “Sect Leader, please, have mercy. I swear, we will discipline him accordingly! I promise! He’ll never even dream of doing something like this again!”

Jiang Cheng glanced down at them, unseeing.

(He could kill them if he wanted to. No one would be able to stop him. If he got all three, no one would even be able to say for sure what happened. Like the brat had said, it was far from uncommon for people to go missing around him.)

‘It doesn’t mean anything,’ Jiang Cheng thought, upon meeting ‘Mo Xuanyu’ for the first time. ‘I should first find an excuse to take him back and use every possible method to get information out of him. It’s impossible for him to not confess anything or give himself away — especially now that he’s reacted this way. I’ve done things like this plenty of times already.’

“Please, Sect Leader,” the mother added in. However, she wasn’t looking at him. Terrified and clutching her son, she kept her gaze down at the floor, displaying absolute subservience in a way Wei Wuxian never did.

(But that stupid, stupid child continued looking up at him, too scared to speak a word.)

(Perfectly silent, just like Wei Wuxian had been under his hands.)

Thus, at that moment, Jiang Cheng ran. He turned on his heel and stormed back toward the village, away from the disgustingly loving family. He really did feel sick just looking at them.

‘You coward,’ he could almost hear his mom hiss. ‘You’re fleeing them! They can’t even do anything to you! How long will it take you to realize that this is exactly the reason no one respects you?’

Jiang Cheng knew that perfectly well. He more than understood. And he was definitely angry enough to act — he wasn’t scared of them. There was nothing those civilians would be able to do to him anyways.

And yet, still, he fled.

“Eh? Sect Leader!” Chang Fang greeted him upon his return. “Where’s the woman who was guiding you? She’s apparently the best expert they have on wines. I wanted to ask her about-”

“We’re leaving!”

“Huh?”

Before the members of his sect could fully understand what was happening, Jiang Cheng had already grabbed his belongings, hopped on his sword, and flown off into the distance. They scrambled after him.

“Sect Leader!” Chang Fang shouted, tearing through the air as fast as she could. “Sect Leader, wait!”

Jiang Cheng didn’t pause or look back, continuing on.

“Sect Leader, we didn’t finalize our deal with the village. We don’t have the textiles for the-”

“I’m not attending the wedding!” Jiang Cheng growled.

“What?! But-”

“We’re. Going.”

That brat from the village might have been insane, but he was right about one thing: it didn’t make any sense for Jiang Cheng to try to go to Wei Wuxian’s wedding. Nie Huaisang was a fool for thinking it’d be a good idea to get Jiang Cheng some time to talk with Wei Wuxian; nothing good would come of that.

He was an idiot for even considering it.

“...and that concludes my report,” the servant of the Nie Clan said, watching his sect leader carefully. Nie Huaisang’s eyes were wide and interested, as though the disciple had just explained the gripping climax of an all-original play. The Sect Leader paused for a bit, thinking carefully.

“I was not expecting that,” he admitted.

The servant eyed him skeptically.

“I wasn’t!” Nie Huaisang insisted. “How was I supposed to know something like this would happen?! The kid didn’t plan it through at all — it was completely impulsive! There weren’t any signs beforehand that would let me predict it!”

The suspicious look he was receiving didn’t go away.

“Do you think I’m fully informed about all things at all times?! This is a completely unfair standard to hold me to! There was no way for me to have known about this!”

True. The servant couldn’t think of any way Nie Huaisang could have known about A-Fan’s plans ahead of time. On the other hand…

“It is you,” he muttered.

“So the standard for what’s possible is different than it would be for normal people?! That’s completely unfair! This is discrimination! The only one for whom the impossible should be expected is Wei-xiong!”

The Nie clan’s employee sent over a rather unimpressed look but also couldn’t really refute that point.

“...Then what do we do now?” he asked. “Should we try to convince Sect Leader Jiang that the child truly was mistaken?”

Nie Huaisang hummed thoughtfully.

“...That might be for the best. A-Fan didn’t really say anything wrong, but the solution he came to both didn’t work and, even if he had been able to kill Sect Leader Jiang, wouldn’t have led to the best outcome. The Sect, by lineage, should end up in Jin Ling’s hands. However, given that he’s already busy with the Jin Sect, the one who would actually end up in charge right now would probably be Jiang Cheng’s highest ranking disciple.”

(Someone who had no problem whatsoever with using the power of the Jiang Clan to track down ‘demonic cultivators.’ This pattern had stopped after the incident at Guanyin Temple because Jiang Wanyin had stopped it. It was difficult to say whether a new sect leader would bring the tradition back.)

“He did,” the servant confirmed. Nie Huaisang thought for a bit longer, contemplative and serious, then grinned.

The servant frowned: “Sect Leader, I don’t recommend trying to use Sect Leader Jiang for entertainment.”

“I’m not! Why is your opinion of me so low?!”

“Years of experience.”

But Nie Huaisang just tutted a few times, expressing his disapproval.

“We shouldn’t be too hasty. For all we know, this could turn out to be a good thing,” Nie Huaisang explained. “It’s a shock to his system! A wall in the road Sect Leader Jiang was traveling on! In the end, this might all be for the best. After all, the fact that he’s stopped hunting down demonic cultivators doesn’t mean it never happened. And besides, a few near-death experiences go a long way in changing people’s minds about things!”

The servant levied a long look at Nie Huaisang.

“I’m serious! I didn’t plan this!”

“Of course, Sect Leader,” he said agreeably.

This was far from the first time a dead silence had filled the simulation after the segment’s conclusion. However, previous times, there had been horror, dread, and impatience keeping them silent.

Now, it was mostly guilt.

‘It was probably Jin Guangyao’s doing,’ they thought. ‘There’s no way I would have allowed that to happen if I’d known.’

Those who were dead at this point in the simulation assured themselves that there was nothing they could have done. Their families, similarly, must not have known.

However, every time their gazes landed on one of the Wens, that sinking feeling would come over them nonetheless.

(It made no sense. Wen Ruohan was a monster. There was no reason at all for them to feel guilty while they looked at him.)

Needless to say, no one was very happy.

(The most unhappy of all was Jin Guangshan, who really, really hoped nothing incriminating would be shown.)

Thus, when the next segment began, the most prevailing emotion among the watchers was dread.

When the world darkened, the first thing they could hear was a smattering of frantic voices. There was a general commotion from all around, rising in volume and franticness as time went on. Then, when the voices died down, an explanation appeared:

“On that night, an extreme crisis flooded the cultivation world,” Lan Sizhui’s voice explained. “At midnight, over fifty sect leaders gathered at Koi Tower’s Golden Pavillion.”

And, indeed, there were sect leaders from large and small sects all gathered around in the grand hall. The number of people that showed up was even greater than the number who arrived to the start of the Sunshot Campaign. Jin Guangshan sat front and center at the head of the table, Jin Guangyao standing beside him.

“Jin Zixuan was away, while Jin Zixun didn’t have enough experience,” Lan Sizhui explained. “Thus, Jin Guangyao was the only one who stood by Jin Guangshan’s side.”

‘None of this bodes well,’ Wen Qing thought.

Jin Zixuan didn’t know whether to be grateful or frustrated that his other-self was gone.

It was hard to decide. At the very least, the simulated Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, Jiang Cheng, and Lan Wangji all wore solemn expressions. Even more concerningly, they said nothing in response to the words flying around.

“I knew it,” someone muttered.

“It would have happened sooner or later,” another agreed.

Casting a glance Jiang Cheng’s way, yet another whispered, “Let’s see how they intend on dealing with this.”

Madam Yu bristled: “Wei Wuxian acted without A-Cheng’s permission! It’s not his fault-”

“Fault?!” Wen Ruohan raised a brow. “I wasn’t aware that the Jiang Sect considered rescuing toddlers to be a sin.”

“It’s not! I know it’s not!” Madam Yu admitted. “But, after what you did, the fact that it was Wens he rescued will be the first thing anyone talks about!”

Normally, Wen Ruohan’s opinion of Madam Yu was low enough for him to discount essentially everything she had to say. Right now, however, he merely fell silent.

(She wasn’t wrong. Out of everyone here, he was the most responsible for what had happened to the Wen.)

And her concerns weren’t completely unjustified either. More and more of those gathered around turned their gazes toward Jiang Cheng, watching his reactions with bated breath. By comparison, Jin Guangyao’s summary of the situation went almost ignored.

“...Four inspectors were harmed. Around fifty of the remaining members of the Wen Sect managed to escape. Once they left, Wei Wuxian led them to the Burial Mounds and summoned hundreds of fierce corpses to patrol the mountain. Our people can’t get any further.”

Many of the watchers tensed, recalling, at once, what had happened the last time Wei Wuxian had ended up there. It was still because of the Wen Sect, but the context surrounding this situation was very different than it had been just a few years before. Now it was the only place he thought he could keep them safe.

‘...Why didn’t he come back to the Jiang Sect?’ Jiang Yanli thought. ‘A-Cheng and I would have protected him. Why, before that, would A-Xian go back to…’

To that dark, wretched, horrible place. Images of countless hands reaching up toward Wei Wuxian’s body — ready to tear him apart and devour the pieces in full — formed in Jiang Yanli’s mind. It was a place without life or light — with rotting flesh and little else. It was a place where Wei Wuxian had nearly died countless times.

Why had he gone back there?

No answer came. Instead, Jiang Cheng spoke next:

“What he did was indeed a bit too much. Sect Leader Jin, I apologize to you in his place.”

Because Wei Wuxian wouldn’t apologize for this; he didn’t regret it. It had been the right thing to do.

“If there’s any way for me to help in this situation, please let me know. I’ll definitely compensate the Jin Sect however I can,” he said.

Compensate the Jin Sect.

As if the Jin Sect had been the victim there.

Jin Zixuan clenched his hands into fists.

However, Jiang Cheng's overly generous words were far from enough for Jin Guangshan.

"Sect Leader Jiang, at first, for your sake, the LanlingJin Sect didn't intend on saying anything. However, some of the involved inspectors weren't from the Jin Sect, but other sects. That makes it…"

He trailed off uncomfortably.

Making Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, Lan Qiren, and Lan Wangji clench their hands into fists, tension taking over. They hadn't specifically recognized any of the inspectors, but all their sects had reportedly gained many new disciples during the war. And, even if it wasn't disciples of their sects that had been there, it was surely disciples of people they knew. How many of their fellow Sect Leaders had condoned this atrocity?

How were they going to trust anyone once the simulation was over?

The simulated Jiang Cheng, however, had a very different concern. He paused, then, withholding a sigh, rubbed at the space between his brows tiredly.

"...I apologize to all the Sect Leaders. Everyone, I must inform you that the Wen cultivator whom Wei Wuxian wanted to save is named Wen Ning. We owe him and his sister Wen Qing gratitude for what happened during the Sunshot Campaign."

"You owe them gratitude?!" Nie Mingjue repeated skeptically. "Didn't the Qishan Wen Sect nearly cause Yunmeng Jiang's annihilation during the Sunshot Campaign?"

'What the Wen Sect does has nothing to do with us,' Wen Qing declared. 'We don't need to pay for their sins!'

And yet here they were, doing exactly that.

Wen Qing had said that when Wei Wuxian had nothing. She had all the power in that situation; there was no need for her to make excuses if she didn't want to. She had genuinely never supported what Wen Ruohan had set out to do.

And then, even though she had no reason to think Wei Wuxian would ever be able to help her in return, she had done everything she could to get him and Jiang Cheng out safely.

Which was why it was quite strange that, after Nie Mingjue spoke, Jiang Cheng said nothing in return.

'A-Cheng?' Jiang Yanli wondered.

Jiang Cheng tensed, casting a glance over at the stone-faced Wen Qing before forcing himself to look away.

Perhaps having predicted their confusion, the simulation provided an explanation a moment later:

"Over the last few years, Uncle had been working late into the night every day," Jin Ling explained. "That day, just as he had decided to take an early rest, he was informed that he'd have to rush to Koi Tower because of the explosive news. He'd been suppressing his anger and fatigue for some time now. With his, um… with his natural… er…"

Jin Ling cleared his throat a few times as if to psych himself up, but stumbled over his words again. There was an exaggerated groan then a shuffling of papers.

This time, Lan Jingyi cleared his throat.

"With his natural competitiveness, he was already quite agitated that he had to apologize to anyone."

Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang both had to stifle laughs at Lan Jingyi's rather tactless way of speaking. Jiang Cheng flushed bright red.

"When he heard the former Sect Leader Nie mention what had happened to his sect again, hatred sprouted within him," Lan Jingyi declared. "This hatred was directed not only at everyone seated in that room, but also at Wei Wuxian."

And, suddenly, the whole situation felt much less funny than it had just moments before.

Finally, seeing that Jiang Cheng wasn't going to answer, Lan Xichen mentioned, "I've heard Wen Qing's name a few times before. I do not remember her having participated in the Sunshot Campaign's crimes."

"But she never stopped them either."

Except she had. Jiang Cheng knew she had. The watchers all turned to look at the simulated one.

He remained silent all the while.

"Wen Qing was one of Wen Ruohan's people. How could she have stood against him?" Lan Xichen continued.

However, uncompromising as always, Nie Mingjue responded, "If she responded with only silence rather than opposition, that's the same as indifference. She couldn't have been so naive as to hope she could be treated with respect while the Wen Sect committed evil without suffering the consequences once the Wen Sect was wiped out."

Yes, that was exactly what Nie Mingjue had always thought. But…

‘The war only started after the Cloud Recesses and Lotus Pier were attacked,’ Nie Mingjue thought. ‘...Those sects weren’t the first ones the Wen destroyed.’

(Just the first ones big enough to fight back. The first ones big enough to motivate the other great sects to fight back.)

Nie Mingjue had been willing to fight Wen Ruohan for years. However, he hadn’t actually done anything until he knew he had support from the other great sects. That was a logical decision; he’d get hundreds of people killed for no reason if he rushed in blindly. However, Wen Qing had acted without any help at all. How could his other self think he had any right to judge what Wen Qing had done?

And more than that-

They had seen the people Wei Wuxian took back. The fifty he rescued were not the entirety of the surviving Wens; they were only Wen Qing’s branch. The group was made up of two people who helped the Sunshot Campaign tremendously during the war, elders too frail to do much more than sit around, and a toddler who hadn’t even been born when the war began. What exactly was his other self expecting them to have done? Why would anyone in their right minds think that those people deserved what the Jin Sect had been doing to them?!

There was a lot his other self hadn’t been told.

And, because it was Wens and no one else, Nie Mingjue hadn’t bothered to look any deeper.

“Qing-guniang, I-” he began, only to cut off when she shook her head.

And that was almost worse.

Thus far, the only person who had even tried to argue in favor of the other side of the matter was Lan Xichen. He was the only one who had both the thoughtfulness and reputation to speak on the matter. However, now, he fell silent.

‘After what happened to Da-ge’s father, it makes sense that he would abhor Wen-dogs more than anything. Lan Xichen thought. ‘Especially when you add in his intolerance toward evil.’

And, after thinking that, his protests stopped.

This time, both Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen winced. Watching themselves interact with Jin Guangyao had allowed them to make several observations from an outside perspective. Nie Mingjue had truly understood, for the first time, that him viewing others as his equals did not mean their situations were the same. People who had not gotten the advantages in life he had would have different considerations to make in different situations. When he took a third of the prey, it was celebrated; when Wei Wuxian did, it was scorned. When he waited before going against the Wens, it was strategic; when the weak, sickly, elderly Wens did, it was cowardice. When he fought to protect his little brother, he was a hero; when Wen Qing did the same, she was overstepping her bounds.

As for Lan Xichen, his concerns were of a slightly different variety.

'Is placating all I can do?' he wondered, frowning as he watched. 'When Da-ge brought up concerns about Jin Guangyao I just told him not to worry. When Jin Guangyao brought up Da-ge's hate of him, I excused it as a misunderstanding. Now, even when I can clearly see that something is going wrong, I stay silent if I think I'll upset Da-ge. If I'd just pushed a little more-'

He looked away, unwilling to ponder that thought any longer. Regret burrowed deep inside him, filling him with a near-physical pain.

(Of course, saying anything was much, much better than saying nothing at all.)

Jiang Cheng stared at his silent other self — who knew for a fact that Wen Qing had betrayed Wen Ruohan — and scowled deeply. To his side, he saw Jiang Yanli wringing her hands together nervously, Jin Zixuan torn between watching her and observing his father somewhat fearfully.

Lan Wangji's eyes became ice-cold.

At that moment, another sect leader spoke up:

"What Sect Leader Nie said is quite right! Besides, Wen Qing was one of Wen Ruohan's most trusted subordinates. You're telling me she never participated? I don't buy it!"

"Right?!"

"I'm in agreement too!"

"Is there any Wen-dog without a single drop of blood on their hands? I don't think so!"

As soon as the Wen Sect's crimes were brought up, the crowd boiled over. Soon, everyone was piping in with shouts and jeers, not allowing any one individual to be heard.

Wen Ruohan's frown deepened.

With the exception of some members of the Great Sects, every person there had bowed to the Wen Sect, once upon a time. They had thrown praises upon them and swore to do anything they could to lend a hand. Wen Ruohan hadn't been so foolish as to think that that loyalty was genuine — especially not after he started a war — but this sight still left a bitter taste in his mouth. He knew for a fact that Wen Qing had never helped him with things like that. Many of these sect leaders, on the other hand, had whispered information and accusations in Wen Ruohan's ears, using him to get rid of people they didn't like. He didn't mind — he was intending to get control of everyone, so the order didn't particularly matter — but to see those same people accuse Wen Qing of things they themselves had participated in…

It would be one thing if they were lying intentionally, but most people here didn't even seem to realize the hypocrisy. If he was in charge, none of them would be able to speak a word.

~~But he wasn't in charge. He had lost. And now Wei Wuxian would have to suffer the consequences.~~

Despite wanting to speak, Jin Guangshan found himself unable to be heard over the noise. Luckily for him, Jin Guangyao stood, managing to attract everyone's attention at once:

"Everyone, please calm down. That isn't the focus of what we're discussing today," he pointed out.

Jin Guangyao was truly the most useful secretary imaginable.

Recalling how the real Wei Wuxian had mentioned finding 'Meng Yao' in their world, Jin Zixuan quietly wondered how his half-brother was fairing.

Meanwhile, under Jin Guangyao's direction, numerous servants came forward carrying platters of fruit. Thanks to that distraction, the gathered cultivators quickly calmed down. Individually, they were all at least semi-capable individuals, but, when grouped up like this, they became easy for Jin Guangyao to shepherd around.

Taking advantage of the sudden silence, Jin Guangshan cleared his throat and said: "Sect Leader Jiang, this is most plainly a matter involving your sect. Normally I wouldn't have barged in-"

"Then don't!" Madam Yu snapped.

"-But, now that things have turned out this way, I feel a need to caution you regarding Wei Wuxian."

And, after seeing first-hand what was going on in that camp — seeing a branding iron wielded against the frail, the sick, the elderly, and against a toddler too young to speak — no one felt very willing to hear him out.

Unfortunately, the same did not hold true for their simulated selves.

"Go on," Jiang Cheng nodded.

"Sect Leader Jiang, Wei Wuxian is your right hand man. We all know you value him a lot," Jin Guangshan began. "However, it's hard to say whether or not he respects you."

'Yes, very difficult to say. He just gave up his core for the brat, after all,' Wen Ruohan scoffed. 'Jiang Wanyin wouldn't even be able to be a sect leader if it weren't for Wei Ying. What respect has he earned? This is exactly the problem with blood-based lineage; all these incompetent, untalented brats-'

Except it was his ancestor who had started that tradition, wasn't it? And, as a lineage-given sect leader himself, he really didn't have any room to talk. Wasn't his own son one of the most incompetent of all?

Unfortunately, Jin Guangshan's argument didn't get better from there.

"We can leave aside what Wei Wuxian did today for a moment," he continued. "In any case, I've been a sect leader for many years and yet I've never seen a servant be so arrogant — so proud. Have you heard what people are saying? Rumors have spread that everything the Yunmeng Jiang Sect accomplished during the Sunshot Campaign was thanks to Wei Wuxian and Wei Wuxian alone! What nonsense!"

Upon hearing that, the tension in Jiang Cheng's body seemed reborn anew.

"What do you think you're doing?!" Madam Yu snapped. "Jin Guangshan, what are you trying to say?!"

"Nothing, Madam," he assured at once, holding up his hands in surrender. "I'm merely repeating what I've heard from outsiders, I'm sure. Isn't it a genuine concern to have a disciple keep so much hidden from his sect leader — to have a disciple do so much on their own? A bit of concern, from one sect leader to another, seems justified to me."

"So he's a 'disciple' to you but a 'servant' to your counterpart?" Madam Jin scoffed. "You're not even mentioning what happened to the guards anymore. This is just about the ranks they have! Nothing you're saying is important!"

Jin Guangshan said nothing in response.

There was almost no need to. After all, within the simulation, various sect leaders were loudly proclaimed their support of Jin Guangshan's words. No one, not even Jiang Cheng, seemed to view Wei Wuxian's rank as irrelevant to the current discussion.

Nie Mingjue glared at his other self, wishing the man would speak up. Unfortunately, after the Wens were brought up, the simulated Sect Leader Nie had descended into a cold, uncompromising glare, barely appearing to hear the words being spoken around him.

"You see? Everyone's thinking it," Jin Guangshan pointed out. "And it only makes sense. Madams, whatever I'm saying now aside, the two of you have brought up social ranks much more frequently."

"What?!" Madam Yu snapped, Madam Jin raising herself up as well. They scoured through their memories, trying to find some evidence to the contrary, only to come up short.

'A-Li, stop peeling that!' Madam Yu snapped. 'You're the master here, not somebody's servant!'

Jiang Fengmian had frowned at her description, muttering a warning, 'San-niang.'

'Did I say something wrong?' she demanded, glaring at her husband. 'Servant.'

(Everyone knew exactly what she had been implying with that word. Especially since, right at the end, she had turned her gaze toward Wei Wuxian, gauging his reaction.)

'What?' she had asked. 'Not willing to hear that word?'

But she had been rightfully angry then! Her son was being forced into the Wens' camp while Wei Wuxian got a choice about whether he would go!

(Because the Wens hadn't given Jiang Cheng a choice.)

This was different, though. Now, Jin Guangshan was using those same word to hurt her son. She wasn't sure why yet, but he was clearly trying to manipulate Jiang Cheng toward his own ends.

(As though she hadn't used those words for that exact same purpose.)

And as for Madam Jin…

She had never once raised the social rank of the people she disliked as a point. Her own husband was one of the most powerful people in the realm, but there were few she hated more than him. However, she had used the circumstances of one's birth against people before. One had to look no further than how she treated her husband's illegitimate children to see that.

(The sin was her husband's, but there was nothing she could do to him. The only people she could take her anger out on were the women and children he had taken advantage of — the only people in this situation who had even less power than her. What right did she have to criticize Jin Guangshan's use of the same tactic?)

The others in the crowd frowned as well but, after a moment, looked away.

(Even Nie Mingjue had brought Jin Guangyao's status up once he was mad enough. Though to a lesser extent, Lan Qiren had also treated Wei Wuxian differently than the other students due to his parentage. Wen Ruohan had no room to talk when it came to morality and Lan Xichen's simulated self, though not contributing, remained silent as all this occurred. Jiang Cheng didn't want to speak against a sect leader, Jiang Yanli knew she wouldn't be listened to, and Wen Qing didn't feel like she could speak to anyone given that Wei Wuxian was doing this to help her.)

Meanwhile, with every murmur that came out of the gathered cultivators' mouths, Jiang Cheng's face darkened just a bit more.

However-

"A-Die, what… what A-Niang and Madam Yu have said in the past isn't important," Jin Zixuan said. "And whether Wei Wuxian's a servant or not doesn't make him wrong! What you were doing — what our sect did to those Wens — isn't something we can just excuse! You-"

"A-Xuan," Jin Guangshan said once, warningly. "That's enough-"

"It's not," Lan Wangji disagreed calmly. Jin Guangshan glanced over at him, making Lan Wangji tense up, but he didn't take back what he had just said. He remained seated, looking Jin Guangshan directly in the eyes.

(His other self had messed up. He had done something horrible to Wei Wuxian. That didn't justify standing aside now.)

Jin Guangshan frowned at the opposition but hesitated, knowing Lan Qiren's presence would make it difficult to confront Lan Wangji directly.

Nie Huaisang sat back, merely watching the surrounding interactions without voicing any of his own thoughts aloud.

While they discussed, the simulated sect leaders continued to speak.

"I heard Wei Wuxian thinks of himself as worth an entire sect on his own."

"I heard that too," another sect leader agreed. "It's preposterous. That servant was only able to accomplish what he did because he was up against a large number of amateurs freshly drafted by the Wen Sect! The ones we had to fight were actual trained fighters."

"A servant went against servants. The only actual fighter who Wei Wuxian defeated was Wen Zhuliu, a servant of the Wen Clan! Being better than other servants doesn't mean anything at all!"

"Agreed!"

With every mention of the word "servant," the simulated Jiang Cheng seemed to grow angrier and angrier.

And, perhaps noticing, Jin Guangshan leaned closer to Jiang Cheng and said, "Sect Leader Jiang, we've all heard rumors about Lotus Pier. Despite his position and the authority you grant him, he doesn't even bother trying to teach your disciples, does he?"

"I heard he did that a lot before the war," someone muttered.

A nod: "I guess he doesn't feel like the Yunmeng Jiang Sect is worth his time anymore."

The two who had spoken were almost too quiet to be heard, mostly just speaking amongst themselves, but Jiang Cheng's fists clenched tightly nonetheless. Jin Guangshan gave a shallow sigh:

"In an event as important as the flower banquet, he dared to throw a fit right in front of you, leaving however he pleased. He even dared to say something like 'I don't care what Sect Leader Jiang Wanyin thinks of me at all!' Everyone who was there heard it with their own ears-"

"No."

Everyone froze. Slowly, they glanced over. It was Hanguang-jun that had spoken. Jin Guangshan furrowed his brows slightly in confusion.

Thus, Lan Wangji elaborated, "I did not hear Wei Ying say that. I didn't hear him express even the slightest bit of disrespect towards Sect Leader Jiang."

The watchers had seen it all. They could draw their own conclusions easily enough.

"Ah, it seems the rumors have gotten quite out of hand," Jin Guangshan sighed. "I apologize; it seems I should have investigated more deeply."

Wen Ruohan just rolled his eyes.

At that moment, someone cleared their throat.

"Hanguang-jun rarely spoke at times like this," Lan Sizhui announced. "Even when people debated cultivation techniques during conferences, he only spoke when others questioned or challenged him. At such times, he, with the utmost concision, overcame their lengthy arguments without fault. Apart from this, he almost never spoke up."

And thus, Jin Guangshan was a little taken aback, not quite sure how to continue.

Unfortunately, Jin Guangyao was now on his side.

"Really? I see. That day, Young Master Wei stormed into Koi Tower with such a tremendous force. He said so many things, each more shocking than the last. I had thought he said something along those lines, but I suppose I can't quite remember either."

Nie Mingjue frowned at those words but didn't outwardly comment. Everyone else, however, appeared swept along.

Ah, Jin Guangyao was proving himself to be astoundingly useful time and time again. Perhaps, when this was over, Jin Guangshan would see if there was any way to keep that mind of his useful while eliminating any chance of betrayal.

(Perhaps, if he hired a bandit to cut off Jin Guangyao's limbs, the boy could serve him with just that mouth of his.)

(Come to think of it, that might be a good solution for Wei Wuxian, too, so long as he could be separated from resentful energy.)

However, unaware of the true value Wei Wuxian offered, the simulated Jin Guangshan just cleared his throat, continuing, "Anyhow, that boy's always been arrogant."

There were nods from all around.

One Sect Leader cleared their throat as well, announcing, "To be honest, I've wanted to say this since quite some time ago, but, while Wei Wuxian did make a few accomplishments during the Sunshot Campaign, there were quite a few guest cultivators who did even more than him!"

Wen Ruohan scoffed.

“-I’ve never seen anyone as full of themselves as him! Excuse my bluntness, but he’s the son of a servant. How could the son of a servant be so arrogant?”

And there it was again. He was ‘the son of a servant’ whose main flaw was being ‘arrogant.’ Not a single person there was even bothering to ask about the actual situation they were gathered to discuss.

Wen Qing sighed: “It’s like a crowd of gossiping housewives.”

Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen both flinched at that description.

And Jiang Cheng frowned.

After encountering the Xuanwu of Slaughter — right before everything fell apart — Wei Wuxian had turned toward him.

‘I need to ask you something. I had a perfume sachet somewhere around my waist. It was empty. Did you see it?’

‘The one MianMian gave to you? I didn’t.’

Wei Wuxian sighed regretfully: ‘I’ll have to find another one later.’

‘You’re at it again,’ Jiang Cheng frowned. ‘You really like her, don’t you? The girl does look fine, but it’s obvious she doesn’t have much background. She might not even be a disciple. She seems like the daughter of a servant.’

Wei Wuxian had then pointed out that he shared the same status. Jiang Cheng’s response had been that Wei Wuxian was different, not that being the child of a servant wasn’t bad. There was no reason for him to say something like that; no one would want to be the child of a servant. It would be stupid to attach yourself to one for something as important as marriage.

(Though, now that Jiang Cheng thought about it, Lan Wangji probably wouldn’t mind.)

Sometime later, after the war, Wei Wuxian had groaned, asking, ‘What do you mean Jin Zixuan’s his only son? Isn’t Jin Guangyao here now? Jin Guangyao seems so much better than him.’

‘So what if he’s better?’ Jiang Cheng responded. ‘No matter how much better he is, no matter how clever, he’ll never be anything more than a servant who greets guests. He can’t compare with Jin Zixuan.’

But now Wei Wuxian was so much better than Jiang Cheng that people were making comparisons.

‘Yunmeng’s Lotus Pier was really the star of the show this time, huh? Almost all the spirits and corpses were summoned to the Yunmeng Jiang Sect’s grounds. There’ll definitely be a number of cultivators interested in joining them.’

'Well, what can we do about that? It's not our fault our sects don't have a Wei Wuxian!' Sect Leader Yao sighed.

"Indeed! He's always had inflated sense of his own accomplishments! I could name a dozen people who did even more!" that same Sect Leader Yao declared now, not showing a hint of doubt in his own words. The simulated Jiang Cheng's aura turned darker and darker with each passing second.

And Jiang Cheng laughed.

'Some 'Two Prides of Yunmeng' we are,' he thought.

The crowd's complaints continued on, public perception of Wei Wuxian decreasing by the second:

"In the beginning, Sect Leader Jin asked for his Stygian Tiger Seal with nothing but good intentions! He was just worried Wei Wuxian wouldn't be able to control it, which would lead to disaster."

"Right?! But Wei Wuxian just jumped to assumptions, immediately assuming everyone was after that weapon of his! What a joke. In terms of treasures, what sect doesn't have a few?"

'Sure, but are those 'few' treasures weapons that can kill thousands of skilled cultivators in a single night?' Lan Qiren thought. 'Even assuming that number is exaggerated, I can't think of anything that would serve as a comparison.'

Wei Wuxian himself thought it was a weapon that shouldn't have been created. Considering what he had managed without it, that said more than anything how dangerous it was.

~~As for what Jin Guangshan's intentions regarding it were, no one wanted to think about that quite yet.~~

The criticism continued on:

"Those with wicked intentions are bound to see wicked intentions in others."

"Indeed. Perhaps that should have been our first sign that there was something wrong with him."

"I knew something would eventually happen if he continued on the ghostly path! Look! His killing intent has been revealed already! Killing us indiscriminately because of a few Wen-dogs-"

"It's not killing indiscriminately, is it?"

And just like that, the chain of criticism was broken. Even Lan Wangji glanced over at that voice, finding its source to be a beautiful woman standing beside one of the farther sect leaders. Her robes were a bold pink and her hair, which had previously been done in two youthful side buns, was now pulled back into a single bun that allowed her bangs to frame her face. Despite the change, she was instantly recognizable.

"Luo Qingyang," Jiang Yanli realized.

"MianMian!" Nie Huaisang shouted almost simultaneously, smile wide.

"What do you mean?" one cultivator asked, unable to ignore the singular voice of disagreement.

"No, just…" she hesitated, realizing at once how many powerful people were looking her way. "I don't mean anything beyond what I said. There's no need to be so agitated, everyone. I just feel describing it as 'killing indiscriminately' isn't an appropriate description."

A man to her right scoffed: "How is it unsuitable? Wei Wuxian has been killing indiscriminately since the start of the Sunshot Campaign-"

"What?"

"No one can disprove that!"

"The Sunshot Campaign was a battlefield," Luo Qingyang carefully pointed out. "Under that logic, everyone who participated in battle would be 'killing indiscriminately.'"

One of the funniest things about this was that Wen Ruohan actually had been 'killing indiscriminately' for years. He hadn't heard this man voice any disapproval back then. Rather, he had been rather happy when one of Wen Ruohan's whims had led to one of his rivals suffering greatly. Then again, Wen Ruohan wasn't 'the son of a servant,' so perhaps those same rules didn't apply.

(Wei Wuxian had done this to save his people. If Wen Ruohan was alive — if Wen Ruohan was there — none of this would be happening at all.)

But he wasn't there. As such, the strongest people in the land stared down the one, singular voice of protest. She trembled slightly where she stood, unable to completely hide her fear, but continued speaking nonetheless.

"If we consider it as it stands, I really don't think it's right to say he's 'killing indiscriminately.' After all, there is a reason. If the inspectors really abused the prisoners and killed Wen Ning, it wouldn't be killing indiscriminately, but getting revenge."

"Jin-gongzi."

"Hm?" he asked, looking over at Wen Qing.

"You... said Luo Qingyang worked at your sect, right? At one of the sub-branches?"

“Uh, yeah,” he confirmed. “Though it looks like she's become a disciple of another sect in the years since. I… don’t know her very well.”

Catching onto Wen Qing’s intentions, Jiang Yanli asked, “Would you be able to find her if you wanted to?”

“Probably?”

She and Wen Qing made eye contact, nodding simultaneously.

This woman was putting herself in danger to protect their brothers when it seemed like no one else would. They would very much like to meet her, after this.

Unfortunately, they seemed to be the only ones who thought so.

“You’re almost laughable!” one man shouted, standing up in his rage. “Don’t tell me you think he was right to have killed our people?! Don’t tell me you’re going to praise it as an act of justice!”

“We still don’t know whether or not the inspectors really did those things, either.”

“So you decided to have a conference without investigating at all?! What are we even there for then?!” Nie Mingjue growled, barely able to speak through his rage. If he had been the one to save the Wens instead of Wei Wuxian….

Forget doing a proper investigation; everyone would simply assume that the righteous Sect Leader Nie had enacted justice and the guards therefore must have deserved it, truth be damned.

“It seems no one’s there to fairly judge what occurred,” Lan Qiren observed. “They’ve already decided on what outcome they want.”

This was just a formality to get there.

(But that was only so long as the great sects supported it. If Nie Mingjue had put aside his anger, if Lan Xichen had investigated further, if Lan Wangji had gone with Wei Wuxian, if Jiang Cheng had told the full story, if Wen Ruohan hadn’t started this at all…)

(But, right now, there was nothing they could do.)

“How are we supposed to know who did what?! It’s not like any of us were there to see it!”

“That’s right, all the inspectors who lived said that they definitely didn’t abuse the prisoners-”

“Except that they definitely did,” Madam Yu scoffed. “You’re trying to pressure the Jiang Sect over this?! Only a fool wouldn’t be able to see the truth! Fell off a cliff? Wen Ning had a flagpole sticking through his chest!"

Wen Qing flinched.

And Madam Yu groaned.

"Why didn't Wei Wuxian just kill all of the inspectors if this was what the result was going to be?" she wondered.

"...He had no proof that they'd done anything wrong," Lan Wangji pointed out. "Because he wasn't killing indiscriminately."

He only killed the ones Wen Ning knew were responsible for his own death. As per usual, however, this choice to be righteous caused him nothing but trouble later on.

'Do more,' Lan Wangji thought, staring at this older self. 'Do more — say more — do something!'

He could be as logical and honest as he wanted. Would that do anything to sway this crowd?

'Tell them about the child! There was a child there! There was a child who's seen his family members murdered one by one — who might have watched Wen Ning get stabbed through the heart for all we know!'

But, of course, Hanguang-jun didn't yet know about him. He wasn't even really listening to MianMian's conversation, busy with his own. But-

'Tell them to believe Wei Ying. Tell them to trust him! Tell them he's not what they think he is! Stand by him!'

Which his other self would do fifteen years later.

Long after Wei Wuxian died.

Everything they had seen and felt in the far-future segments hadn't been experienced yet by those within the simulation. They didn't know the first thing about Wei Wuxian and so felt free to speculate as they pleased.

"I'll bet Wen Ning died after falling off a cliff by accident! Wei Wuxian just wanted an excuse to kill them!"

"Right?! The inspectors even went so far as to properly bury his corpse, and yet this is what they received in turn!"

"How disappointing."

But Luo Qingyang persevered, adding, "The inspectors are scared that they'll be considered responsible for abusing and killing those people. Of course they'd insist he fell off on his own-"

“You can stop bothering. I don’t want to hear anything else from someone who so obviously has ulterior motives.”

“Ulterior motives?!” Madam Jin repeated, realizing what he was alluding to at once. “You little-”

“What? Explain!” Luo Qingyang requested, her face flushed. “What do you mean in saying I have ulterior motives?!”

“What need is there for me to explain? I’m sure we all know. Let me guess: you fell for him back in the cave of the Xuanwu of Slaughter just because he flirted with you? You’re still arguing in his favor, calling black, white no matter how irrational that seems. Ha. Women will always be women.”

A cold chill ran down the watcher’s spines at the combined fury of Madam Jin, Wen Qing, and Madam Yu.

(Once he got used to the angry glares beside him, Jin Guangshan just shrugged to himself. Those men had a point but, in her defense, Wei Wuxian was very pretty.)

And moreso-

“If they remember the Xuanwu cave, then they should remember A-Xian risking his own life to save them all, shouldn’t they?” Jiang Yanli asked. “I remember some of the people there. They’re here now. Why won’t they say anything?!”

Lan Wangji frowned deeper and Jiang Cheng had to look away.

If someone else would just speak-

“Ah, so that’s why,” someone muttered. “That definitely explains why she’s so desperate to speak up for Wei Wuxian.”

Nie Mingjue growled.

“Tsk, tsk, tsk,” another sighed. “And just look at how innocent you pretend to be. Even your heart has grown sideways. How could you be expected to be rational?”

Lan Xichen clenched his fists.

“Stop wasting your time on her. I don’t even know how she wound up a member of my sect. And she even found her way into the Golden Pavillion. I’m embarrassed just standing beside her.”

MianMian flushed red.

“Fine! Fine!” she shouted. “Your voices are louder! Fine! You’re the rational ones!”

Many of those who had spoken were from her sect. She clenched her teeth together, tearing her sect’s crest off her outer robe with great force and slamming it onto the table with a bang. The Sect Leaders and Lan Wangji, who hadn't been paying much attention until then, turned to look at her in surprise.

She turned on her heel and marched away.

"If you're taking it off, don't put it on again. You really think you're so capable?!"

Because what could this mean except that she was leaving the sect?

"Who does she think she is, going as she pleases?" another member of her sect asked. "Who cares? What's she doing this to prove?"

"Ha. Women will always be women. They quit after you say a few harsh words-"

Madam Yu would very much enjoy a conversation with this particular person.

"In a few days, she'll definitely come back on her own."

"There's no doubt. After all, she finally managed to change from 'the daughter of a servant' to a disciple. She'll return soon."

"I don't think so~" Nie Huaisang commented with a sing-song tone.

"But… why would she just leave her sect?!" Jiang Cheng asked, mystified. "What's she going to do now? I doubt any sect will want to accept her now."

"Maybe she's fine with that," Wen Qing said. "Maybe that's better than staying there."

"But-" Jin Zixuan paused, a little stunned by what he'd just seen. "But… I can't imagine it would have been easy for her to raise her status to being a disciple of an actual sect. Is she… really just going to throw that away?"

Madam Yu certainly couldn't imagine doing that. Neither could Jiang Cheng, Madam Jin, Lan Qiren, or many of the others there. But…

But Wei Wuxian had. They weren't sure when, exactly, but he was clearly not a member of the Jiang Sect at the time of his death. The son of a servant and the daughter of a servant had been willing to give up everything they'd worked for. Their convictions were stronger than any materialistic intentions. Still...

"Everyone, she is gone already. Let's settle down," Lan Xichen requested. Immediately, the whispers that had been passed around vanished at once, everyone settling in.

It was just like a couple segments ago, when continuous, logical protests from Jiang Yanli did nothing, but a single word from Lan Xichen was enough to make Jin Zixun flee. Lan Xichen had never had anyone treat him the way they treated Luo Qingyang.

(And, similarly, Xichen had always trusted Jin Guangyao because of how the man acted around him. Unfortunately, as was now becoming frighteningly clear, people didn't treat him they way they treated everyone else.)

And thus, one by one, conversation became directed toward Wei Wuxian again. No one else spoke up in his defense.

(It was hard to tell, now, whether that was because no one believed in him or because no one thought they'd be heard.)

As Nie Mingjue had asked, what was even the point of this conference anymore? He laughed once.

"I don't understand," he muttered, rubbing between his brows. "No one listened to her at all. She was right. She was… how can they all be so…."

"Blind?" Wen Ruohan suggested. "You're right; they are. People like them need to be controlled before they can be allowed to have any power."

"You shut your mouth," Nie Mingjue hissed. "Having you completely in charge of them would be even worse than how things are now!"

"Really?" Wen Ruohan asked, directing his gaze out to the simulation once more. "Are you sure?"

Because, all around, bitter hatred spewed from everyone's mouths as they recounted Wei Wuxian's many misdeeds. How unfortunate the prison guards were. How evil the Wens who were saved must be.

Smiling once more, Jin Guangshan turned to Jiang Cheng and said, "He's been plotting to go to the Burial Mounds for a while, hasn't he?"

"Why would he want to go back there?!" Nie Huaisang asked, remembering all too well the horrors Wei Wuxian had experienced his first time through.

(Things no one at that conference knew.)

"With his skills, it would be child's play for him to set up a sect of his own," Jin Guangshan pointed out. "He's using this as a chance to leave the Jiang Sect so that he can do whatever he pleases. You put so much work into rebuilding Yunmeng Jiang, and yet he goes around stirring up trouble at every opportunity. He doesn't care about you at all."

Jiang Cheng paused, then, almost as an afterthought, protested, "That probably isn't the case. Wei Wuxian has been like this since he was young. Even my father couldn't do anything about him."

But Jiang Fengmian had never wanted to stifle him.

And Jiang Cheng….

"Even Fengmian-xiong couldn't do anything about him, huh?" Jin Guangshan chuckled lightly. "Fengmian-xiong just favored him."

Jiang Cheng flinched.

'Wei Ying, listen to me. Protect A-Cheng. You have to protect him even if you die, understand?' Madam Yu shouted.

Jiang Fengmian paused, then, slowly, reached out to ruffle Jiang Cheng's hair, whispering, 'A-Cheng, be well.'

He knew he was going to die. These would be his last words to his son.

Then, he turned to Wei Wuxian.

'A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.'

There was most certainly a favorite between the two of them. It was not Wei Wuxian.

Jiang Cheng hadn't been thinking clearly then. It was no surprise that his simulated self hadn't been able to fully analyze his parents' last words. He couldn't be blamed for some lingering insecurities.

But, if he took actions based on those insecurities — based on something that wasn't even true — then what would that mean?

"Sect Leader Jiang, you're not like your father," Jin Guangshan continued. "It's been a couple of years since the re-establishment of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect. Now is precisely the time to display your power. And yet Wei Wuxian doesn't even know how to avoid suspicion and judgment. What will the Jiang Sect's new disciples think if they see him? Don't tell me you'll let them view him as their role model and look down on you?"

With every word, the darkness in Jiang Cheng's gaze grew.

"Sect Leader Jin, you've said enough. I'll go to the Burial Mound and deal with this."

Satisfaction colored Jin Guangshan's expression.

"That's the right idea. Sect Leader Jiang, there are some things, some people, you shouldn't put up with."

Jiang Cheng nodded, standing up. Taking that cue, many other sect leaders stood up with him, all walking out as one. The sparks of hatred in this group were still burning bright.

Jin Guangshan gave a light sigh.

'It's not like I don't understand, but… ah, my other self, you have such a narrow view of the situation.'

He watched the simulated Jin Guangshan send everyone off with cold eyes.

‘All you know is that Wei Wuxian got access to some form of new cultivation. For all you know, he read about it in a book. He hasn’t had time to show his true inventive power yet. I understand trying to separate Wei Wuxian from the Jiang Sect — there’s no reason to allow them to keep that kind of power if you can stop it — but you haven’t seen even a fraction of what Wei Wuxian is capable of. If you knew about all the improvements he’ll make to cultivation as a whole in just a few short years, I’m sure you’d be willing to let him stay in the Jiang Sect so long as you get Jiang Yanli to marry A-Xuan. At that point, it’ll just be a matter of time before there’s an opportunity to kill the Jiang brat and absorb the Jiang Sect into us.’

However, as his other-self didn’t yet understand Wei Wuxian’s potential, he had deemed that too high a risk to accept and had instead gone for cutting him off.

“How unfortunate,” Jin Guangshan mumbled.

Behind fields and fields of Sparks Amidst Snow, the Venerated Triad was gathered.

“You’ve worked hard, A-Yao,” Lan Xichen said, nodding once at him in acknowledgement.

Jin Guangyao smiled in return: “It wasn’t hard work. Those who had to truly work hard were the ones attending to Sect Leader Jiang’s table. Some parts of it crumbled under his rage. Seems like he was really angered by all this.”

Jiang Cheng blushed.

To the side, Nie Mingjue scoffed: “Sure. All that clever talk was hard work indeed.”

The sarcasm was obvious.

Jin Guangyao had done many, many unforgivable things. However, Nie Mingjue couldn’t help but shift uncomfortably as he watched this.

Jin Guangyao’s smile froze in place. Lan Xichen remained silent. After hesitating for a few more moments, Jin Guangyao directed his attention to Lan Xichen once more.

“Er-ge, do you know where Wangji is? I saw him leave early.”

In response, Lan Xichen gestured toward the entrance to the garden. Lan Wangji stood there across from Luo Qingyang, the two of them conversing with solemn expressions.

Jiang Cheng squirmed in his seat.

(It wasn’t like the simulated Jiang Cheng hadn’t said anything. He had explained that he and Wei Wuxian owed them. He just… could have said a tad bit more.)

A moment later, Lan Wangji bowed, saluting her respectfully. There was a weight on his shoulders and a tension in his brows. Luo Qingyang returned the salute, appearing even more grave than he had.

Quietly, with barely enough motion to be seen, Jiang Yanli bowed as well. She knew full well why she had not been present at the conference. Regardless of her rank in society, this was a gathering for cultivators; she only counted as one by the loosest of definitions. Despite the years her mother had spent expressing her disapproval about it, this was the first time Jiang Yanli found herself truly wishing she could change that.

Right now, all she could do was be grateful for those who managed to protect Wei Wuxian in her place.

(Protect him from, mainly, the people gathered in this room watching the simulation. Out of the corner of her eye, Jiang Yanli saw several people looking away uncomfortably. After all, they had been right alongside Wei Wuxian every step of the way. Not once had he done anything they could truly say was immoral.)

Then, at last, Lan Wangji and Luo Qingyang rose. They nodded at each other one last time before she walked down the steps of Koi Tower, having left behind her sect and rank for the sake of what was right.

"That woman has more backbone than the mob of her sect," Nie Mingjue commented, impressed. Jin Guangyao nodded in agreement.

Nie Mingjue frowned. Not, this time, because of Jin Guangyao; his eyes were now focused entirely on his other-self. The simulated Nie Mingjue admired Luo Qingyang's nerve but not her opinions. He didn't agree with her, so he wouldn't speak up. Because the people Wei Wuxian was defending were Wens.

But Wei Wuxian was right, so-

"Two days later, Uncle Jiang left for Yiling," Jin Ling explained.

Jiang Cheng flinched. It wasn't for the words themselves, but rather the speaker. He hadn't forgotten about Jin Ling through all this, but the specifics — all the misinformation Jin Ling had, and all the hate Jiang Cheng's other self had encouraged for years — hadn't been at the forefront of his mind until this moment.

The simulated Jiang Cheng flew through the air, thirty disciples trailing after. The large crowd cast intimidating shadows on the world below as they cut through the sky at a rapid speed.

For a moment, Jiang Cheng thought back to the third segment, which showed him and Wei Wuxian entering the Cloud Recesses for the first time. Would the version of him from back then ever be able to imagine that he would bring a crowd like this to meet his Da-shixiong?

No. Definitely not.

They flew down, arriving at the entrance to the Burial Mounds. It was a flat area, far away from the pointed cliffs Wei Wuxian had been dropped into a terrifyingly short time ago. All around, corpses roamed.

Nie Huaisang swallowed nervously.

The Jiang cultivators held back for a moment, watching carefully. However, no matter how long they waited, the corpses never moved to do anything. Tentatively, one disciple stepped over the boundary-

A low roar of warning came out of every corpse in the vicinity.

Even the watchers tensed up at the reaction, still vividly recalling what happened to Wei Wuxian last time he was here.

(In the back of their minds, there was a small ringing sensation. It was a command, left by the patriarch, which they had no choice but to follow: 'don't let anyone in. Everyone is dangerous.')

(Including, apparently, the Jiang.)

Luckily that command didn't ~~yet~~ apply to Jiang Cheng. When he marched forward the corpses stepped aside, only returning to prevent Jiang Cheng's disciples from following after him.

"Wait at the bottom of the mountain," Jiang Cheng called back at them. "I'll go alone."

Before the disciples had time to protest, Jiang Cheng had already taken off again. He marched through the forest, not paying any mind to the blackened bamboo or leafless trees along the path. Calling it a 'path' might be a little too generous. The stones and dirt here were exactly the same ashy material as everything else on the mounds. Weeds were plentiful and Jiang Cheng occasionally had to step around large stones in the path. It wasn't a trail — trodden down by thousands of steps every day. It was a place that had never seen human life before. After all, no one would be stupid enough to stay here willingly.

(Unless they had no other choice, of course.)

After a great deal of walking, Jiang Cheng finally began to hear voices in the distance. He marched in that direction, his steps forceful and uncompromising. The weeds were crushed beneath his feet. Soon, he came across an area with a few tree stumps scattered about in an arrangement that resembled tables and chairs. Wei Wuxian sat on one; Wen Qing on the other. In the distance, an elderly man was hard at work plowing a field.

Allowing his leg to bounce as he thought, Wei Wuxian suggested: "How about potatoes?"

"No." The woman shook her head. "Radishes. Radishes are easy to grow. They don't die as easily, either. Potatoes are hard to look after."

"Radishes are disgusting," Wei Wuxian countered.

Jiang Cheng snorted.

And the watchers paused.

"...What?" Nie Mingjue asked.

"This is… not what I was expecting them to be talking about," Lan Xichen admitted.

"Yeah. Really terrifying threats to the cultivation world, these two are," Nie Huaisang piped in, earning him an (unfelt) whack on the head from Nie Mingjue.

As if they had already known Jiang Cheng was there, Wei Wuxian and Wen Qing turned around, unsurprised, to watch him approach. Once he got close enough, Wei Wuxian stood up and walked past Jiang Cheng without a word. Just as silently, Jiang Cheng followed him up the mountain, away from the Wens.

Jiang Cheng frowned, then shook his head. It would be silly to assume Wei Wuxian was intentionally leading him away from the weakened Wens. There was no reason for him to. There was probably something for them to look at on top of the mountain. Jiang Cheng wasn't his far future self ~~yet~~.

But Wei Wuxian's walk continued on. Soon, they passed by another group of people from the Wen Sect. The cultivators were busying themselves with a plank of wood, and, having taken off their robes, looked no different from villagers one would be able to find anywhere. The coarse cloth they wore now was much better for working, and the hammers and nails in their hands appeared to have long-since replaced their swords. As soon as Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng got close enough to be seen by them, the workers froze.

Their gazes didn't shift from Jiang Cheng's impressive robes until he was out of their sight once more.

Before the simulation, Nie Mingjue would have given almost anything to have the arrogant Wens look at the other sects that way.

It didn't feel so good, anymore.

Finally:

"...What are you doing?" Jiang Cheng asked.

Glancing back, Wei Wuxian responded, "Can't you tell? We're building houses."

"Building houses? Then what about the ones we saw at the bottom, tilling dirt? Don't tell me you're actually going to try farming here!"

"Of course we are. Didn't you already hear me and Wen Qing talking about it?"

Right. And the watchers had known basically from the beginning that Wei Wuxian would end up in the Burial Mounds once more. However, this still felt too fast. Wei Wuxian and the Wens were already planning to live out the rest of their lives here, but… surely there were other options? Surely, they had a few other ideas to try too.

‘We Lans speak of our righteousness to any who arrive,’ Lan Qiren thought, watching with heavy eyes. ‘Boasting is against the rules, and yet the standards we hold everyone to speak of that nonetheless. Be humble. Be strict with yourself. Be ethical. Be just.’

But, upon saving innocents (including a toddler), Wei Wuxian had not gone to them. He hadn’t gone to the righteous Lans, the brave Nie, or even the Jiang.

“He doesn’t trust us,” Lan Qiren muttered.

“Is he wrong not to?” Lan Wangji wondered, quietly.

No one spoke in response.

Meanwhile, Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes and shook his head, asking, “Do you really intend on stationing yourself here in the long run? Can people survive in such a dammed place?”

“They shouldn’t have to.”

“I survived here for three months,” Wei Wuxian responded calmly.

As if those three months hadn’t been a never ending fight for his life.

“I can’t believe you’re trying to grow food on a mountain of corpses. Will it even be edible?” Jiang Cheng furrowed his brows.

“Believe me. When people are really hungry, they’ll eat anything they can.”

Nie Huaisang brought a hand to his mouth, feeling nausea rise up within him. The other heirs and Jiang Yanli had turned pale at the words and Wen Ruohan’s frown deepened.

Then, in an expression of what they had all been thinking, Jiang Cheng asked, “You’re not coming back to Lotus Pier?”

Wei Wuxian just laughed, explaining, “Yunmeng and Yiling are so close. I’ll just sneak back when I feel like it.”

Jiang Cheng snorted: “You wish.”

It was the same sort of interactions they used to have before the war — before everything that followed. However, even after seeing it, the watchers couldn't manage to relax.

(And, despite how many times she had tried to sow a rift between the two of them, Madam Yu found herself growing increasingly tense as time wore on.)

”Wei Wuxian, if you do-”

Jiang Cheng cut off. When Wei Wuxian glanced back, he saw a small figure hanging onto Jiang Cheng’s leg.

“A-Yuan?!” Wen Qing gasped out.

The child was about one or two, barely tall enough to come up to Jiang Cheng’s knees. Raising his chubby chin, the toddler looked up at Jiang Cheng with dark, round eyes.

Seeing him, Jiang Yanli breathed out a sigh of relief. It had been horrible to hear the sect leaders debate earlier — though calling ‘let’s accuse Wei Wuxian of anything we can’ a ‘debate’ was more than a little generous. It was beyond clear that no one there had any idea what the camps had actually been like. Putting aside the farce of an excuse used to catch Wen Ning (something Wei Wuxian had told the sect leaders about), the conditions of the camp were far too cruel. The fact that the prisoners included a child too young to have even been alive at the start of the war was something everyone needed to know.

But now, at last, her brother had seen.

Unfortunately, Jiang Cheng had no love in him at all.

“Ugh,” Jiang Cheng scowled, shaking his leg. “Where did this kid come from? Get him away from me!”

“Where did the kid come from?” Lan Xichen repeated, perplexed. Because obviously the answer was “the camps.”

A thought which should be filling Jiang Cheng with horror right now.

Wei Wuxian bent down and picked up the child, holding him in his arms as he said, “What do you mean ‘get him away?’ Can’t you talk properly? And, A-Yuan, why do you hug the legs of everyone you meet? Off you go — hey! Don’t bite your nails right after you’ve been playing with mud. Do you know what that mud is made of? Move your hand. Don’t touch my face either.”

Despite the cross words, Wei Wuxian’s mockingly stern attitude only caused A-Yuan’s smile to widen. For a moment, a strange feeling of inadequacy came over Madam Yu.

(She had rarely spoken to Cangse Sanren. Even less so after their children were born. Thus, she had only seen the wretched woman taking care of her son once. Wei Changze did most of the scolding in that family, but he had been away speaking with Jiang Fengmian at the time. Thus, when Wei Wuxian went a little too far into the lakes and nearly got himself hurt, it had fallen on Cangse Sanren to be the stern one.)

(Her manner of speaking at that time was almost exactly how Wei Wuxian spoke now.)

“Honestly, get your hands out of your mouth,” Wei Wuxian ordered, forcefully prying them out. “Where’s granny?”

At that moment, an elderly woman came hobbling over. She walked using a cane, her white hair standing out against the dark clothes she now wore. When her eyes landed on Jiang Cheng’s expensive robes, her eyes widened and she bowed lowly.

Wen Ruohan gritted his teeth.

Leaning down, Wei Wuxian placed A-Yuan by her side, ordering, "Go play over there."

A-Yuan nodded once and walked away, holding onto his limping grandmother's hand as he did. As they got farther and farther, A-Yuan began glancing back at Wei Wuxian nervously, as if trying to ensure he was still there.

~~Whether A-Yuan consciously realized it or not, he and his family's lives would be over if Wei Wuxian decided to go home with Jiang Cheng instead.~~

And, watching the pair depart, Jiang Cheng couldn't help but laugh: "The Sect Leaders all thought you'd gathered some of the leftover Wen forces and crowned yourself king of the hill. Seems it's only the old, the weak, the women, and the children."

Nie Mingjue had to look away at that.

As Wen Qing said, no one in her branch had fought in the war. They had probably done more for the Sunshot Campaign's side in all honesty. But, after the war ended, any members of her branch who could have fought ended up "falling off a cliff" before the year was up. The lineup of corpses at the camp had made that more than clear. Wei Wuxian and Wen Qing were the only ones in the Burial Mounds who could possibly pose any danger. And yet-

'Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead and burned the burial mounds to the ground,' the tavern guest gossiped.

Those guests had been wrong about nearly everything they said. However-

Upon meeting Jin Ling for the first time, Wei Wuxian learned the truth of Mo Xuanyu's parentage, muttering, 'At the first siege of the burial mounds, Jiang Cheng ranked first, and the Jin Clan must have been second. How hilarious that I've got his bastard son's body now.'

'First' in terms of how hard Jiang Cheng tried to destroy the Burial Mounds.

But Jiang Cheng himself had just admitted there was no army here, so-

"Where's Wen Ning?" Jiang Cheng asked. Wei Wuxian, who had begun grinning at the sect leaders' great misconceptions about the situation, glanced over slowly.

"...Why are you asking about him?" he wondered.

"There are countless people who have been asking me questions about that one," Jiang Cheng responded coldly. "Who could I get answers from but you?"

Tilting his head in acknowledgement of that, Wei Wuxian began to walk once more. Jiang Cheng joined him, the pair moving side by side until they reached a large cave. It was almost pitch-black inside, a small fire made on a few dried branches being the only thing keeping it alight. Candles would be too much of a luxury for them to afford at the current time. The dry, dirt-covered ground crackled under their steps.

Clink.

Jiang Cheng paused and looked down, realizing he had knocked something over with his feet. It was a half-finished compass, various characters and inscriptions carved out on the metal inside.

Jiang Cheng moved his leg to nudge at it again-

"Don't kick that. It's useful," Wei Wuxian called out. "I haven't finished that one yet."

"The Compass of Evil," Lan Qiren realized. "He started working on it already?"

(Or, rather, why start working on it here at all? Why were they building houses? Why did they genuinely feel like a death trap that tried to eat Wei Wuxian alive was the only place they could turn to?)

Right as Wei Wuxian picked the compass up, Jiang Cheng accidentally stepped on a crumpled up flag.

"Don't ruin it! That one's useful as well."

And it was. It definitely, definitely was.

Once, Wen Ruohan had given Wen Qing the finest medical equipment imaginable. She had grand halls, the finest needles, the cleanest work spaces, and a sect full of people who could cater to her needs. It would be impossible to not notice her talent and a crime to not put it to good use. Her betrayal was not something that could be overlooked, but, seeing how things had played out now, it was hard to treat her decision as a simple matter.

No matter what, Wen Ruohan's choice to allow her skills to grow couldn't be considered wrong.

If given the chance, Wen Ruohan would have given Wei Wuxian all the resources he could possibly have needed to see his creations through.

Instead, these priceless ideas laid in abandoned, crumpled heaps on the rocky ground.

Wei Wuxian carefully set them to the side.

"You're the one who just left them on the floor," Jiang Cheng pointed out. "It's not anyone's fault but yours if someone steps on them."

"I live here alone. What does it matter if I scatter a few things around?"

"A-Xian, you live here?" Jiang Yanli asked, looking around once more. Her mood sank further and Jiang Cheng felt his stomach twist uncomfortably.

(While this was better than Wei Wuxian's first time in the Burial Mounds, words could not express how little that meant.)

The pair walked deeper into the cave. An assortment of both recognizable and unrecognizable talismans were scattered along the walls and floor. Some were even crumpled into balls or ripped to pieces, burn marks along their edges.

(Failed products, it would appear.)

The deeper in they went, the messier it got; Jiang Cheng's annoyance grew in synch. Finally, they managed to reach the main area of the cave. There was a person lying on the ground there, covered head to toe in talismans which each contained a faint, red glow.

The watchers had experienced a lot of resentful energy over the past few weeks. They had felt it wild and uncontrolled in the beasts all around, then watched it become seduced and restrained while under Wei Wuxian's control. This, though, felt like nothing they had experienced before.

"It's warm," Wen Qing muttered softly, kneeling down next to her brother's corpse. It wasn't really warm — not in the sense of temperature, at least — but the energy it gave off was soft in a way resentful energy had never felt before. It was coaxing and gentle; soothing, rather than rough.

Jiang Cheng scowled.

"You live here?" he asked. "Where do you sleep?"

Pointing at a pair of crumpled blankets in the corner, Wei Wuxian easily answered, "With those, I can sleep anywhere."

'Believe me. When people are really hungry, they'll eat anything they can.'

Lan Wangji took a deep breath, trying to stop his hands from trembling.

Jiang Cheng glanced back down at the motionless Wen Ning with a look of disdain, asking, "What happened to him?"

"He was a bit too fierce. I was worried he'd go out of control, so I've sealed him up so he can't move for the time being."

Wei Wuxian thought Wen Ning was being too fierce. That skittish, shy, trembling child who couldn't even look Wei Wuxian in the eyes when they first met had become this.

Although it was covered up by talismans, the part of his chest that had been crushed in was still impossible to ignore.

"Wasn't he a shy stutterer when he was alive?" Jiang Cheng asked, having noticed the same. "Why's he so fierce now?"

Although he was the one who asked, he didn't sound very curious. It was more confrontational, if anything — challenging Wei Wuxian's words to make sure all the information he was being given was right.

‘So that I can do the right thing,’ Jiang Cheng thought. ‘So that I know the truth. So that I won’t be led astray.’

In the back of his mind, some small part of Jiang Cheng told him that, if his and Wei Wuxian’s positions were reversed, Wei Wuxian would have a lot more questions about A-Yuan’s presence right now. Jiang Cheng’s future self, however, barely seemed to care about Wen Ning’s state, much less the child’s.

Jiang Cheng frowned slightly, looking down at Wen Ning’s corpse with a complicated expression. Not too long ago, he had been in the exact same position, refusing to eat or drink or otherwise move after losing his core, preferring to simply let himself waste away. At that time, Wei Wuxian, Wen Qing, and Baoshan Sanren saved him, but it was Wen Ning that made the first step to offer help. If he hadn’t done that, it was hard to say what would have happened.

And now that same boy was here — dead.

Jiang Cheng looked away. A moment later, unable to hide his curiosity, he looked up at his other-self, who continued staring down at his former savior with contempt.

Given the stress the simulated Jiang Cheng was under when he lost his core, it wouldn’t be surprising at all if he didn’t remember much of that time. However, he had admitted that he and Wei Wuxian owed the Wen siblings for what they had done. He knew full well that they had put their lives on the line to protect him, even if he didn’t remember the details.

Right?

But it was hard to describe the look in Sect Leader Jiang’s eyes as gratitude. He waited for Wei Wuxian to respond — for him to justify the seal he had placed on Wen Ning.

Thus, Wei Wuxian did:

“Wen Ning was indeed quite a timid person. But, as a result, he hid all his feelings within, bottling them up no matter what happened. Hatred, anger, fear, anxiety, pain — these emotions were pent up inside him for too long. They culminated into this after he died. The more nice a person is, the scarier they are when they lose their temper. The quieter he was in life, the fiercer he’ll be after death.”

“Haven’t you always said ‘the fiercer, the better?’” Jiang Cheng recalled. “The heavier the resentful energy is, the greater the hatred and the stronger the power.”

“That’s right, but… I don’t want to make Wen Ning into that kind of a corpse.”

Jiang Cheng scowled, annoyed at Wei Wuxian’s vague words.

It was a reaction that made sense. There were multiple kinds of corpses: walking corpses, fierce corpses, and regular just-dead ones. The most useful kind was fierce corpses, which Wen Ning already was, and Wei Wuxian also very clearly wasn’t trying to purge the energy to make him a regular corpse.

So:

“What do you want to make him into?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“I want to restore his consciousness.”

Jiang Cheng sneered and rolled his eyes: “Are you half asleep? Awaken his consciousness? What’d be the difference between a fierce corpse and a human being, then?”

Despite his question, it was clear that he didn’t think Wei Wuxian would be able to even come close to that. Which was the correct response if you didn’t know what the Yiling Patriarch was capable of.

But…

‘Why don’t you know?’ Wen Ruohan wondered. ‘There was plenty of time between the Sunshot Campaign and this for Wei Ying to start inventing. Why did he only start after he arrived in Yiling? And it wasn’t desperation — I can’t imagine the Compass of Evil is useful for him right now. Were you and the other sects really so disapproving of demonic cultivation that he wouldn’t even try to create these things? That at least makes sense for the other sects — the more Wei Ying creates, the more power the Jiang Sect has — but why would you not encourage him to try?’

One perhaps had to look no further than the conference that had just occurred to answer that.

‘You fool,’ Wen Ruohan thought. ‘You could have had anything. Wei Ying would have made you anything — would have made you unstoppable — so long as his morals aligned with yours. You could still have everything. If you side with him right now, accept his foolish decision to save what remains of my sect, then you will have the world at your feet.’

(And, though that didn’t really occur to Wen Ruohan, it would also be the right thing to do.)

But the future Jiang Cheng just scoffed once more.

“If you really do succeed, no one would need to cultivate. No one would even need to be human! They could just come to you and ask you to make them a fierce corpse!” he pointed out.

Wei Wuxian laughed, acknowledging, “You’re right. I know full well that this is too fucking hard. But I’ve already boasted to his sister that I’ll be able to do it so now everyone here thinks I can.”

He shrugged, still grinning.

“I don’t have a choice in this matter anymore. I have to succeed or I’ll have no face left-”

A clang of metal coming to an abrupt halt rang through the air.

One moment, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng had been talking casually with one another.

In the next, Jiang Cheng had unsheathed Sandu and gone for Wen Ning's neck. If Wei Wuxian hadn't reacted as quickly as he did, blocking the blade with his bare hand, Wen Ning would have lost his head.

"What are you doing?!" Wei Wuxian snapped.

The answer was simultaneously unreachable and painfully clear. Jiang Cheng had unsheathed his sword and tried to cut off Wen Ning's head. Wen Ning — who had helped the future's juniors countless times, who had repeatedly saved Jin Ling, who had already saved Jiang Cheng from Wen Ning's own family — would have been destroyed.

'Wei… Wei-gongzi, I'm here to help you,' he said.

Wen Ning, who had come to the battlefield solely to help them, would have been dead for good.

Wen Qing felt the world go red.

"How dare you?!" she shrieked.

Jiang Cheng jumped at her voice, falling back into his seat. Protective, Madam Yu stood up at once to face the doctor, hissing, "Step back!" at her, but Wen Qing's glare didn't falter in the slightest. Her eyes only narrowed in fury.

"What am I doing? I'd like to ask what you think you're doing!" the simulated Jiang Cheng shouted back. "Wei Wuxian, you've been quite full of yourself these days, haven't you?"

'I've never seen anyone as full of themselves as him! Excuse my bluntness, but he's the son of a servant. How could the son of a servant be so arrogant?'

Wei Wuxian glared, snapping back, "Do you think I'd suggest something so preposterous if I had any other choice? Wen Qing and the others-"

"You've got no choice because Wen Qing and the other Wens are forcing you? Well, now you're forcing me to respond! A few days ago, at Koi Tower, countless sects surrounded me, demanding an explanation. My only choice was to come."

But the explanation he was looking for was right there. He had seen it himself just a short while ago. That explanation had wrapped itself around Jiang Cheng's leg, lifting its chubby cheeks to smile up at him with an unhesitant joy. The Sects were demanding an explanation? What part of a toddler being among those who were saved — being among 'the old, the weak, the women, and the children' — wasn't enough of an explanation for Jiang Cheng?

A moment after he thought that, the answer came to Nie Mingjue.

'It's because they're Wens, isn't it.'

And Jiang Cheng's hostility, fueled by everything that had been said to him thus far, seemed to crackle beneath his skin like lightning.

Slowly, Wen Qing's gaze turned to the side. A circle of glowing light was inscribed on the floor, covered in characters written by Wei Wuxian's hand and pulsing with power. By stepping into it, Jiang Fengmian had rejoined the outside world. Wen Qing couldn't do anything to the others while in the simulation, but that all changed once she got out-

"A-Qing, sit back down," Wen Ruohan ordered, calmly.

"Sit down?" she hissed, turning to face him. "You want me to just sit down?!"

The future Jiang Cheng's gaze slowly drifted over to Wen Ning once more. His grip tightened around his blade. In response, Wei Wuxian made the surrounding energy spike to attention, ready to intervene again if need be.

Wen Qing hadn't been able to do anything for her brother no matter what she saw happen to him. There was no one she could speak to — reason with — no one she could curse. The ones who had been involved in Wen Ning's death weren't here. Wen Qing didn't even know their names! They may have all promised to not punish anyone for things that had yet to occur, but the fact that this was an inability instead of a choice made it that much harder to swallow. Her brother, her A-Ning, was the best. He was so, so good. He had saved Wei Wuxian when he didn't have to — he had saved Jiang Cheng — he had gotten the Jiang parents' ashes back for them! This, right here, wasn't right. It wasn't fair. There had to be something she could do.

(And there was… so long as she left.)

"A-Qing," Wen Ruohan spoke again. "This isn't the end. There's plenty more for us to see."

"I know," she acknowledged. "I know that. But I can't just-"

"My only choice was to come," Jiang Cheng repeated.

Wei Wuxian looked back at him, unwilling to step aside.

"Fine! Then tell me, what exactly am I supposed to say to them?" Jiang Cheng asked. "What should I do when they all come to me demanding answers?"

"They want an explanation? There's nothing further to say; we're even already. The inspectors beat Wen Ning to death and Wen Ning became a fierce corpse and killed them. A tooth for a tooth, a life for a life — it's over now."

"It's over? How could it be? Do you have any idea how many eyes are watching you right now?! How many are watching your seal? If there's an opportunity there, you won't be in the right even if you are!"

And there, again, was a confession.

'Was he wrong?' Lan Wangji asked.

'...No, he's not wrong,' Jin Guangyao said. 'But it's because he's right that he can't say such a thing in front of them, right?'

Jin Guangyao had said it. Jiang Cheng had said it. Who knew how many other people agreed. It almost seemed like everyone thought Wei Wuxian was making the morally right decision here. And yet, fifteen years later, everyone would agree that Wei Wuxian was the most vile scum to have ever walked the earth. Jin Ling had stabbed him because of that.

And, as Jin Zixuan glanced to his father on his right, he couldn't help but recall that it was the Jin Sect that had used Xue Yang to reform the seal in question.

However, almost at a loss, Wei Wuxian just sighed: "It's as you've said: I won't be right even if I am. What can I do except jail myself here?"

Wen Ruohan's eyes narrowed at those words.

"What can you do? Isn't it obvious?" Jiang Cheng asked back, and, using his sword as a pointer, he gestured to Wen Ning's collapsed form. "The only way to settle things now is to end it before they get the chance to!"

"End what?"

"Burn this corpse right now and return the leftovers of the Wen Sect!"

With that declaration, Jiang Cheng began marching back out of the cave. Wei Wuxian ran around, cutting Jiang Cheng off and spreading his arms to block out all sight of the Wens. His gaze was angry and desperate. He was protecting them.

From* Jiang Cheng.

"Are you insane?" Wei Wuxian asked. "Without me, the only thing waiting for them will be death!"

"Why do you care about what kind of an end they'll meet? If they end up dead then fine! What does it have to do with you?!"

"Jiang Cheng! Watch what you say!" Wei Wuxian snapped. "Take it back! Don't forget who it was that helped us get Uncle Jiang and Madam Yu's corpses! Who returned to us the ashes that are in Lotus Pier right now?! Who took us in while we were being chased by Wen Chao?!"

"You're the one who should shut your mouth! Yes, they helped us before, but why can't you understand that right now any member of the Wen Clan is an enemy of the world?! No matter who they are, those with the surname Wen have committed the most heinous crime. Those who protect the Wen Sect will be condemned by everyone! All cultivators loathe the Wen-dogs so badly that they'll be happier the more painful a death those dogs receive! Whoever protects them will be standing against the world! Nobody will speak in their favor, and no one will speak for you."

And had they not, just a few minutes ago, watched a conference proving that very fact?

(Except it wasn't quite true, was it? Lan Wangji had tried. Luo Qingyang had tried. Lan Xichen had spoken up and made even Nie Mingjue pause and listen. They had waited for Jiang Cheng to explain. And then, because he was having a "bad day," Jiang Wanyin remained silent and the conference went on.)

There was a pause in the world.

"...I don't need anyone to speak for me," Wei Wuxian said.

"You can't even protect yourself now!" Jiang Cheng pointed out. "Why care about them? Whoever stands by them now will be labeled a public enemy."

"They never joined in any slaughter — they saved lives! You know that!"

"And so what?! They're from the Wen-"

Before anyone could react, Wei Wuxian had shot forward and punched Jiang Cheng in the jaw. The Sect Leader flew back and then stumbled a few steps, a shocked look on his face. He truly hadn't expected that.

The two martial brothers stared at each other, neither able to speak a word.

The simulation paused.

And, in the lull that followed, a laugh was heard.

"What was it the future Jiang Wanyin said, back then?" Wen Ruohan wondered aloud. "When he brought a dog to Wei Ying's feet? You told him he hadn't been careful enough with what he said to Jin Ling, didn't you?"

Slowly, the Chief Cultivator turned to look at him.

"'Have you forgotten who's the reason Jin Ling's had so many whispers behind his back?'" Wen Ruohan recited. "'You've forgotten the things you've said. The promise you made. But don't you dare forget how his parents died.'"

Lan Wangji glanced over.

"I wonder… how much worse is it to remember what A-Qing and her brother did for you and still accept their deaths?"

Jiang Cheng couldn't move.

After all, once that was brought up, the countless other lies told by the future became impossible to ignore. Wei Wuxian being "responsible" for the destruction of the Jiang Sect — the fact that him saving Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji was used as the Wen Sect's excuse — was accepted as common knowledge. The "Wen army" he had apparently gathered together was the same. Although they didn't yet know what happened to Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, these past experiences made the "truths" of the future impossible to believe. The future Jiang Cheng was, therefore, impossible to trust.

However, unfettered by that, Madam Yu marched forward.

“What are you trying to say, Wen Ruohan?” she asked, standing in front of her son. “You can’t blame this all on A-Cheng. It’s the sects as a whole pushing him into this situation. Everyone will consider him an enemy if he sides with them. It’s not his fault people hate the Wen Sect so much! None of this would be happening if you hadn’t started the war!”

A statement which was, unquestionably, true.

“A-Cheng is doing the best he can right now! How many options do you think he has? He can’t just do whatever he wants. Not everyone is you. Not everyone is Wei Wuxian!”

“Clearly,” Wen Ruohan snapped back, and the weight of that one word destroyed any relief Madam Yu’s words had instilled in Jiang Cheng. Their concerns only grew when they realized Wen Ruohan had focused his gaze on the inscriptions covering the floor below.

The Chief Cultivator’s smile gained a sharp edge.

‘It’s almost laughable. Are they really defending this?’ he wondered, eyes gaining a slight red hue as they reflected the light of the array. ‘If you decide that what you can gain is worth the actions you take then fine! I certainly have no room to complain. But… you can’t do these things — make these choices — and still genuinely believe you’re in the right! No one is gaining anything from this! The Wens in the labor camp weren’t being applied to anything useful, they were just people the sects wanted to hurt. Isolating Wei Wuxian will indeed bring the Jiang Sect’s power down, but… you can’t just throw away a talent like him. That only takes away value from the world. There’s no point! There’s nothing to gain. They’re doing this because they’ve deluded themselves into thinking they’re in the right so all of this-’

It was all-

It was just-

It was happening for no reason. Half the people involved didn’t even realize this was what they were being led to do. Wen Ruohan must have gone insane when he decided it would be okay to let Jiang Fengmian and Wen Chao leave the simulation. This was what the cultivation world got up to without his presence. Jiang Fengmian was too cowardly to stop it and Wen Chao would surely only make it worse. He needed to get out — find Wei Wuxian — find the unconscious forms of the other Sect Leaders and make sure they-

“Sect Leader!” Wen Qing shouted at once.

He paused.

Then, silently, he glanced back.

“...We have more to see,” she said. Her fists were clenched together tightly. Some of Wen Ruohan’s bloodlust had begun to slip out in the past few minutes, setting everyone else in the simulation on edge. Nie Mingjue had stood up, blocking off Wen Ruohan’s view of Nie Huaisang and Madam Yu had done the same with her children. The weaker cultivators had fallen to their knees, unable to remain standing under this. Despite that, Wen Qing managed to maintain eye contact with the Chief Cultivator, not faltering even a little.

She took a slow breath out.

"...It's like you said," she continued, "We have a lot more to see. It will be a waste to act too hastily and miss out on everything else we need to learn."

Because, in all likelihood, something much worse was about to come.

Thus, just like Wen Qing had a few minutes before, Wen Ruohan forced himself to calm as well. As much as it bothered them, they both knew the best thing to do right now was to wait and see.

The simulation was still frozen, the future Jiang Cheng's stunned expression on full display. Even when Wen Ruohan's rage dissipated the simulation did not continue. It seemed it had overestimated the amount of time they would need to talk.

An awkward silence spread over the crowd. Jiang Cheng felt the most awkward of all. In his mind, various memories began to play.

'Jiang Cheng, listen up. When you become sect leader, I'll be your subordinate. I'll follow your lead just like my father followed your father. The Lan Clan has its Twin Jades of Lan; our Jiang Clan will have its Two Prides of Yunmeng! If anyone dares to say you're not good enough, I'll beat them up myself!'

Wei Wuxian's job was supposed to be protecting Jiang Cheng from others. That's how this was all going to work out. The only reason it might not, according to the initial segments of the simulation, was that Wei Wuxian would betray the Jiang.

And yet, right now, even the future Jiang Cheng had admitted that Wei Wuxian was in the right. It was just that, much like after the fall of Lotus Pier, what was 'right' wasn't Jiang Cheng's priority:

'Why? Why? Just why?!' Jiang Cheng had shouted. 'Are you happy now? Are you satisfied?! Why did you have to save Lan Wangji? Why did you do that? I don't care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die! What's their deaths got to do with us? With our sect? Why did this have to happen? Why?!'

And then, just now…

'Why do you care about what kind of an end they'll meet? If they end up dead then fine! What does it have to do with you?!'

Except the real Jiang Cheng had gotten to know Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan. He did care if they died. And, even more than just themselves, if Jin Zixuan died, there would be no Jin Ling.

(And besides, that wasn't even why the Wens were there. They had found an excuse to burn down the Cloud Recesses first; if Wei Wuxian had really just stood aside they would have found a different reason to come. They were there to set up Supervisory Offices. Punishing Wei Wuxian had just been an added bonus.)

(And right now, in much the same manner, the Wens didn't matter. This was about the seal and Wei Wuxian's power. If they thought there was a chance they could acquire those things then morality wasn't a factor anymore.)

Which, logically speaking, would mean…

"A-Cheng?" Jiang Yanli whispered, softly.

Jiang Cheng flinched.

"A-Cheng," she whispered again, stepping closer. Jiang Cheng stepped back, keeping his head down. For perhaps the first time he could recall, he was too scared to look his sister in the eyes.

What would he see if he glanced up now?

"A-Cheng, please look at me," she requested. However, he did not comply.

'Do what is right, even if it seems impossible.' How many times had his father repeated that to him? How many times had his mother screamed that, when she accused him of favoring Wei Wuxian? The reason why had always been simple: Wei Wuxian understood the Sect's motto better than him. He embodied it without even trying to.

A fact he had just proven once again.

Out of the corner of his eye, Jiang Cheng saw Wen Qing standing silently to the side. She and Wen Ruohan appeared to be having a strange staring contest with each other, communicating something non-verbally. Jiang Cheng felt nothing but hate for Sect Leader Wen. What else could he feel when staring at the man who had ordered his parent's execution? Wen Ruohan had killed some of Jiang Cheng's family — why shouldn't Jiang Cheng get to do the same to him?!

Well, for one, in the simulation Wen Ruohan was already long-dead.

And two: Wen Qing had fought back too.

~~And three, even if she hadn't, Jiang Cheng knew, logically, that she didn't deserve death.~~

And Wen Ning and A-Yuan-

"A-Jie," he muttered. "A-Jie, I-"

Jiang Yanli wrapped her arms around him and Jiang Cheng fell silent once more. They still couldn't touch, but the implied hug was felt nonetheless. The warmth Jiang Cheng knew would be there wrapped around him comfortingly.

“It’s okay, A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “It’s okay. I won’t let this happen. I-I can’t fight, but I won’t let this happen! I won’t let A-Xian go through this. I’ll be right there with you if this happens to us and we’ll figure out a way to help him together!”

“Me too!” Jin Zixuan added. “I-I swear! My sect won’t do anything like this again! And if-if they do, I’ll be right beside you.”

Jin Guangshan frowned at the declaration.

“Us as well,” Lan Xichen agreed, Lan Wangji nodding too. Nie Huaisang looked over at his brother tentatively but grinned upon receiving a firm nod of agreement.

“We’ll all be prepared,” Lan Qiren confirmed. “We’ll keep anyone in a situation like this safe. This won’t happen. Not here. They won’t have to live somewhere like the Burial Mounds again.”

And that would be good. That would be perfect, but-

“I don’t think the Burial Mounds are the problem.”

The words slipped out before Jiang Cheng could think them through. Once released, they were impossible to take back.

(It was their sects that would launch the siege, after all. Rather than trying protecting them, doing nothing might lead to the best outcome there was.)

No one was quite sure how to respond to that.

Then, in the back of the room, Wen Ruohan began to laugh.

When the simulation resumed, his laughter wasn’t finished yet. Thus, it served as an unnerving backdrop over Jiang Cheng’s next words:

“Wei Wuxian, don’t you understand?” he asked, straightening himself up. “When you’re on their side, you’re a bizarre genius — a miraculous hero — a flower that blooms alone. But, the second your voice differs from theirs, you become a criminal: you’ll have lost your mind, ignored morality, and walked the crooked path.”

Which might indeed be true.

So Jiang Cheng’s solution, with all his power as the leader of one of the Four Great Sects, was to join the “them” instead.

(How many of those at that conference were equally certain Wei Wuxian was in the right and just unwilling to speak up?)

“Wei Wuxian! Do you really think you’re immune to their condemnation? Do you really think you can do whatever you want? That you can be righteous alone? There’s no precedent for something like this!”

“Then I’ll be the precedent!” Wei Wuxian shouted back.

“Have you really not realized what the situation at hand is like? Do you seriously need me to say it out loud?!” Jiang Cheng marched forward and grabbed onto Wei Wuxian's collar, shaking him as he shouted, “If you insist on protecting them, then I won’t be able to protect you!”

“Then there’s no need for you to protect me! Just go!”

Somehow, those words seemed to shock Jiang Cheng more than the punch did. He could do nothing but stare as Wei Wuxian brought a hand up, knocking Jiang Cheng’s grip off of him.

This Jiang Cheng still wanted to protect him. This Jiang Cheng was still trying to protect him. But, if Wei Wuxian wasn’t going to concede, they might have found a limit to what Jiang Cheng was willing to do.

“Just go. Leave me alone,” Wei Wuxian requested, his eyes dimming in defeat. “Tell the world I defected. From now on, no matter what Wei Wuxian does, it has nothing to do with the Yunmeng Jiang Clan.”

“What?” Madam Yu asked. Jiang Yanli’s eyes grew wide and Wen Qing’s face became pale. Jin Zixuan was trying to look everywhere at once, gauging others’ reactions as if doubting what he had just heard.

Lan Wangji stepped forward.

“Wei Ying,” he muttered softly. “Wei Ying, you won’t have any protection at all then.”

He would truly be cut off from them.

Madam Yu stood still, muttering, “But-but they said he… why would he….”

‘You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!’

Jiang Fengmian and Madam Yu had both made him promise to protect Jiang Cheng. His choices were now putting the sect in danger. However, unlike Wen Zhuliu, his ‘debt’ wasn’t worth more to him than the lives of innocents. So instead…

“You’re doing this… all for the Wen Sect?” Jiang Cheng asked, face blank and uncomprehending. “Wei Wuxian, do you have a savior complex or something? Is it that you’ll die if you don’t stir up trouble?!”

“Shut up!” Jiang Cheng hissed, unable to standing listening to his other self for even a moment longer.

But Wei Wuxian barely seemed to register what Jiang Cheng had said, merely responding, “...That’s why we should cut ties now. In case I do anything that could affect the Yunmeng Jiang Sect in the future.”

It was a kind of loyalty that, for all of Wen Ruohan's accomplishments, he had never managed to find. It wasn't Wen Zhuliu's mindless obedience, but it wasn't Meng Yao's treachery either. Perhaps, if he had made different choices, Wen Qing would have offered him something like this. Perhaps not.

But-

'Surely, surely, Jiang Wanyin won't be stupid enough to throw this away.'

However, at that moment, an expression they had never seen on him before crossed Jiang Cheng's face. It was half desperation, some disbelief, some denial, and some hate. Just like Jin Ling had narrated before, this hate did not appear to be directed at just the situation, but rather at Wei Wuxian himself.

"...It's just like my mother said," he muttered. "You really do bring our sect nothing but trouble."

Jiang Cheng flinched once again.

"Attempt the impossible, huh? Fine. You understand our sect's motto. Better than I do — better than all of us do!"

He winced once more.

Jiang Cheng resheathed Sandu and, tone indifferent, said, "Let's arrange for a duel."

"What?" Jiang Yanli whispered.

At that moment, although the images before them changed to reflect what was being said, narration took over the explanation. With a heavy tone, Lan Sizhui read aloud:

"Three days later, the Sect Leader of the YunmengJiang Sect, Jiang Wanyin, had a duel with Wei Wuxian. They met in Yiling. When negotiations failed, they began to battle. Under Wei Wuxian's command, the fierce corpse Wen Ning struck Jiang Cheng once, breaking one of his arms. Jiang Cheng stabbed Wei Wuxian."

Sandu impaled his gut.

Wen Qing flinched, pressing against that spot on her own body unconsciously. That kind of an injury would stall even a cultivator. If it was experienced by someone without a core-

'Surely, if my theory is correct, Wei Wuxian would have told him by now, right?'

So maybe she was wrong. But, even then-

"Both sides suffered losses. They spat out mouthfuls of blood and cursed each other. In the public eye, they had finally fallen out. After the fight, Sect Leader Jiang made an announcement to the world:

“Wei Wuxian has betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy! Yunmeng Jiang hereby expels him, breaking all ties and drawing a clear line between us! From now on, no matter what he does, it will have nothing to do with the Yunmeng Jiang Clan!”

The simulation drew to a close.

In the silence that followed, those last lines replayed in everyone’s minds.

‘From now on, no matter what he does, it will have nothing to do with the Yunmeng Jiang Clan!’

Fine. Wei Wuxian had agreed to that.

‘Yunmeng Jiang hereby expels him, breaking all ties and drawing a clear line between him and us.’

That cut off some of Wei Wuxian’s options but it wasn’t the end of the world. He and Wen Qing had already started planning on becoming self-sufficient within the Mounds.

‘Wei Wuxian has betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy!’

“Well,” Nie Huaisang muttered. “That changes things.”

Everyone flinched.

(With the exception of Jin Guangshan, who only sighed in disappointment at the poor choices his other self had made.)

Slowly, bit by bit, everyone turned to look at Jiang Cheng. He flinched and, in the next moment, Madam Yu was standing in front of him again.

“What?!” she snapped. “Is there a problem?!”

“...Your son appears to have inherited your temper, Madam Yu,” Lan Qiren couldn’t help but comment. The words made Jiang Cheng clench his fists together tightly enough to draw blood. At that moment, a memory formed:

‘I shouldn’t blame him? If he hadn’t fought with Zixuan, none of this would have happened! Ha. Ever since you’ve brought him here, you’ve always favored him. Even over your own son! If it was Jiang Cheng who made a scene would you rush to Gusu like you did? Never!’

Then, after the Xuanwu Cave — after Wei Wuxian had almost died saving everyone — after Jiang Cheng got jealous…

‘He’s not strict with me. He just doesn’t like me,’ Jiang Cheng muttered.

‘What kind of person can’t stand his own son? Of course he likes you!' Wei Wuxian insisted back.

Perhaps already knowing that, if it came down to it, he would be ordered to put his life on the line to protect Jiang Cheng over himself.

But Jiang Cheng had insisted, 'It's true. He can't stand my mom, so he can't stand me either.'

That wasn't entirely true, but it wasn't completely false either. And this temper, right here, was exactly what Jiang Fengmian had wanted to change about him. This was exactly the sort of thing he had gotten lectured about that day. Because Wei Wuxian was always so much better — understood the sect's motto so much better — while Jiang Cheng-

'It serves you right to be bored to death! You shouldn't have played hero, and you shouldn't have cared for such a hell of a thing!'

In other words, 'you should have let the love of your life and Jin Ling's father die.'

'A-Cheng, there are some things that should never be said even if you're angry,' Jiang Fengmian had said.

And what was it that Jin Ling and Lan Jingyi had just said? His future self had been working late into the night. Right when he decided to take an early rest, he had been summoned to the conference. He'd had to apologize to everyone, which made his anger worse.

'When he heard the former Sect Leader Nie mentioned what had happened to his sect again, hatred sprouted within him,' Lan Jingyi declared. 'This hatred was directed not only at everyone seated in the room, but also at Wei Wuxian.'

'A-Cheng, there are some things that should never be said even if you're angry.'

Switching 'my Shixiong has decided to leave the sect,' to 'Wei Wuxian has betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy' probably counted under the bracket of 'things that should not be said.' Jiang Fengmian, in the end, had shown he loved Jiang Cheng more. He had always loved Jiang Cheng more. And Madam Yu's Zidian had responded to his commands — she loved him — and he had gone back to save her, too. He loved them.

However, this was still a part of them Jiang Fengmian disliked.

(And now, because Jiang Cheng never listened, the sects would be burning the Burial Mounds to the ground.)

Although reacting less strongly than her son, Madam Yu couldn't help but recall the same things. She had always known she had a quick temper and, throughout the years, she had heard no end to the complaints about it whispered behind her back. Her own sect, her husband, the Jiang Sect's disciples….

~~Well, hadn't they had a point? It was exactly that temper of hers that led the Wens to burn the Jiang Sect down, right? Of course Jiang Fengmian hadn't wanted to marry her; she destroyed the sect and then blamed Wei Wuxian.~~

Jiang Cheng had always taken after Madam Yu more closely than Jiang Yanli. That was something Madam Yu had always been fully aware of.

‘Sect Leader Jiang, take a good look at your biological son! Jiang Cheng is your flesh and blood!’ she shouted at him, knowing full well he and Cangse Sanren had never had an affair. ‘Even if you don’t like him because I’m his mother, he’s still your son!’

Because, as Lan Qiren said, Jiang Cheng had truly inherited that temper of hers.

They had wondered from the beginning of the simulation how Wei Wuxian could have become an enemy of the sects. The truth they now had was almost unsatisfying compared to what they had expected. It should be more. Jiang Cheng having a string of bad days shouldn’t have been a factor. Wei Wuxian should have done something truly wrong before this and-

“Then again, it’s not like the rest of us are all uninvolved,” Nie Mingjue muttered.

Everyone turned his way.

“Da-ge?” Nie Huaisang asked.

“A bunch of us were at that conference, weren’t we? Part of the reason Wei Wuxian and Jiang Wanyin split up was because they thought we would do something to the Jiang Sect, right? If I’d just shut my mouth back when Xichen started pointing out that Wen Qing hadn’t hurt anyone-”

“It’s hard to say what would have happened,” Wen Qing interrupted. “Sect Leader Nie, you were blinded by your hatred and uncompromising to the point of ignorance. Your decision to forgive the sect leaders who changed sides at the end of the war but not even investigate enough to realize A-Yuan was there is something to learn from, correct?”

Nie Mingjue flinched but didn’t disagree. He nodded once.

“Good.” Wen Qing nodded back. “However, while you appeared to genuinely think your hatred of the Wen Sect was righteous, I’m not sure I can say the same about you, Sect Leader Jin.”

He jumped slightly, not having expected the abrupt mention.

“Miss Qing-”

“Doctor,” she snapped back. “Sect Leader Jin, you might have limited how much you spoke, but you were the first one to tell Jiang-gongzi that he had to ‘caution’ himself around Wei Wuxian — that Wei Wuxian didn’t respect him.”

“I-I-” Jin Guangshan stood. “Regardless of whether I was right or not, it was a reasonable conclusion to come to. Everyone was saying it. I didn’t even really say anything about your family-”

“Yes, you only spoke about Wei Wuxian. Because my family didn’t have any Stygian Tiger Seals for you to acquire.”

Everyone froze.

‘We can leave aside what Wei Wuxian did today for a moment. In any case, I’ve been a sect leader for many years and yet I’ve never seen a servant be so arrogant — so proud. Have you heard what people are saying? Rumors have spread that everything the Yunmeng Jiang Sect accomplished during the Sunshot Campaign was thanks to Wei Wuxian and Wei Wuxian alone! What nonsense!’

Because, for Jin Guangshan and Jiang Cheng, it really wasn't about what Wei Wuxian had done for the Wens. At most, Jin Guangshan just couldn’t do this while Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen would oppose it.

But-

“As I said when that scene first played, everyone was thinking it,” Jin Guangshan pointed out. “Even Jiang-gongzi agreed that it was an important point. I didn’t say anything wrong-”

“Until you flat-out lied to him about what Wei Wuxian had said.”

Jin Guangshan frowned, ready to berate whoever had spoken to the Sect Leader of the great Jin Sect that way, only to freeze at the last second. Staring back at him was Wen Ruohan, the smirk on his lips not hiding his growing impatience. In the pause that stretched out between them, everyone recalled what their Chief Cultivator was referring to:

‘In an event as important as the flower banquet, he dared to throw a fight right in front of you, leaving however he pleased. He even dared to say something like ‘I don’t care what Sect Leader Jiang Wanyin thinks of me at all!’ Everyone who was there heard it with their own ears-’

‘No,’ Hanguang-jun disagreed. ‘I did not hear Wei Ying say that. I did not hear him express even the slightest bit of disrespect towards Sect Leader Jiang.’

Jin Guangshan had floundered, after that.

So Jin Guangyao stepped up.

“Well, in any case, we shouldn’t come to conclusions so hastily,” Jin Guangshan continued. “How many times has the simulation led us in one direction only to reveal that the truth was completely different? More than that, how many times has Jin Guangyao lied to turn a situation into something favoring him?”

Nie Mingjue, who had been about to object to Jin Guangshan’s words, gritted his teeth at that. Similarly, Wen Ruohan’s anger became redirected momentarily.

“That snake has fooled every sect leader he’s had,” Jin Guangshan continued. “I have no doubt he would push for something like this if he thought it would secure my affection for him. Who knows what he told me before this all began. And besides, Madam Yu, the things I told your son were mostly copies of what you’ve told my wife over the years.”

“What?” Madam Jin flinched. “I never told you about any of that-”

“The walls have ears, my dear. In any case, everything I said was hardly news. People have been talking about Jiang Fengmian’s favor for Wei Wuxian for years. The use of his parentage was a regrettable decision on my part, but I’m far from the only one who has fallen prey to such temptations, accusing people of being the sons of prostitutes and such. Besides, trying to solve the problem we have is still better than doing nothing.”

Nie Mingjue and Lan Qiren couldn’t move. Lan Xichen and Jiang Yanli looked away.

“As for pushing Jiang-gongzi to go visit Wei Wuxian, that was the rational thing to do. Of course I would want a sect leader to handle a situation involving his own sect, especially considering how unwilling he was to share the details of the ‘debt’ he owed Wen-guniang. How could I have known it would play out this way? Don’t you agree, Sect Leaders?”

“No,” Lan Wangji said.

As always, a single word from ‘Hanguang-jun’ could command the attention of the entire room.

“Sect Leader Jin, you assembled the conference. The guiding force into making this a question of Wei Ying’s status was you.”

Lan Qiren nodded once, asking, “Are you sure your other-self didn’t expect this outcome?”

“Of course! He would be foolish to want this,” Jin Guangshan confirmed.

‘Or, rather, ignorant,’ Sect Leader Jin continued mentally. Wei Wuxian had so much more to offer than the simulated Jin Guangshan realized; the Stygian Tiger Seal was just the beginning. Rather than isolating Wei Wuxian to get the seal it would be far more profitable to separate Wei Wuxian from the seal — from his demonic cultivation, from his protection and power — and take hold of his mind instead.

What a pity.

However, Lan Wangji wasn’t done.

“‘He’s been plotting to go to the burial mounds for a while, hasn’t he?’” Lan Wangji recited, his memory as impeccable as always. “‘With his skills, it would be child’s play to set up a sect of his own. He’s using this as a chance to leave the Jiang Sect so he can do whatever he pleases. You put so much work into rebuilding Yunmeng Jiang, and yet he goes around stirring up trouble at every opportunity. He doesn’t care about you at all.'”

“Lan-er-gongzi, you-”

“'That’s the right idea. Sect Leader Jiang,'” Lan Wangji continued, and even Lan Qiren didn’t so much as blink at the interruption. “'There are some things, some people, you shouldn’t put up with.'”

Jin Guangshan gaped, thrown by Lan Wangji’s harsh glare.

“Jin Guangyao never spoke directly to you throughout the entirety of that conference. Are you trying to suggest that everything you said was made up of what he suggested to you ahead of time? That you don’t covet Wei Ying’s seal at all?”

“I suppose you would know all about coveting him, wouldn’t you?”

Lan Wangji couldn’t suppress his flinch. The image of Wei Wuxian being pressed — slammed — against the tree behind him formed in Lan Wangji’s mind. At that moment, Jin Guangshan began to step closer.

“Lan-er-gongzi, be reasonable,” he advised, looking down at the still-seated Lan Wangji. “Do you still think of yourself as a pure statue of jade? You should know by now that rumors can’t be believed. Your father is a perfect example of that, isn't he?”

Lan Qiren froze at those words. He had stepped between Jin Guangshan and Lan Wangji while the sect leader was still talking. However, after what Jin Guangshan had just said, neither Lan Qiren nor Lan Xichen could do anything but gape as Jin Guangshan walked right past, phasing through Lan Qiren's incorporeal body. Lan Wangji slowly looked up.

Then, voice too quiet for anyone else to hear, Jin Guangshan whispered, “What I’ve done was shown to everyone. What do you think they would say if they got a hint at what you did to him behind closed doors? The Concealment Zone, powerful though it is, doesn’t stop me from talking about it.”

Lan Wangji’s skin paled into a snow-white.

“I suggest you stay quiet, young master,” Jin Guangshan advised. “Unless you want everyone to know, of course.”

Everyone would know everything. How the future Lan Wangji had gone against the Sect’s rules — done exactly what he had feared his future self would do — had acted so horribly, horribly wrong. It made Lan Wangji sick just thinking about it. He had taken something from Wei Wuxian. He had stolen something precious and Wei Wuxian had just accepted it. Lan Wangji’s future self had broken the Sect rules in a horrible manner.

But…

But right now…

“Sect Leader-”

“I told you to keep your mouth shut, didn’t I?” Jin Guangshan said. “I prefer you when you’re quiet.”

Lan Wangji’s mouth closed.

However, under the weight of their own actions, no one else in the simulation seemed able to speak. The Wens were too distracted by what had occurred, Nie Huaisang wasn’t going to speak up, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen felt too responsible to shift blame, Jiang Wanyin and Madam Yu couldn't move at all, and Jiang Yanli and Lan Qiren were too ashamed over how little they had managed to do. If Lan Wangji didn't speak…

"There we go," Jin Guangshan smiled, pleased at the silence that had come over La Wangji. "Much better. You-"

"Uncle, Xiongzhang, I have something to tell you," Lan Wangji said, standing up. They looked toward him.

Jin Guangshan stepped back, eyes wide, and hissed, "Lan-er-gongzi, what are you doing?"

Lan Wangji paused, looking back at him, but looked away once more.

"Uncle, in the last segment… no, two segments ago. At Phoenix Mountain. When you…"

He paused, sorting through his thoughts. Almost on principle, Lan Wangji never spoke until he had carefully thought through everything he had to say. Now, however, he had no time to think.

"When the Concealment Zone activated and you were all frozen in space… I-I did kiss Wei Wuxian," he confessed.

The other watchers stared blankly, thrown by the irrelevant topic. They had suspected as much, but Lan Wangji had denied it. Or, rather, spoken vaguely about it. And Wei Wuxian's reactions hadn't added up.

That said…

"That's… great?" Nie Huaisang said as one of the few people who still had the mental capacity to speak. "I'm… glad to hear your relationship progressed."

"No. No that… didn't happen." Lan Wangji took a shaky breath. "He didn't know it was me. I took it from him while he was blindfolded. I… I disobeyed the Sect rules. I went against morality. I acted without his permission. I forced myself on him-"

"You what?!" Jiang Cheng stood up, finally registering what Lan Wangji was saying. "You — on Wei Wuxian? You did that?!"

"...I did," Lan Wangji forced himself to confirm.

Jiang Yanli paled.

"It was a breach of his consent," Lan Wangji elaborated. "Regardless of how he felt after, what I did was wrong. I… I swear I will never allow that to happen again. It won't happen in our world. Nothing of the sort will ever come to be. I… will tell Wei Ying what I did once we leave the simulation. If he doesn't want to see me, I will comply."

A brief silence passed throughout the room. What Lan Wangji was describing did seem bad. Jiang Cheng especially felt his stomach turn at the image it provoked. However, having not seen it happen, not knowing the full details, and getting told it by the perpetrator himself made it altogether a little hard to be mad.

And, most of all…

'We've just seen labor camps set up by the Jin. People were being tortured by a bunch of cultivators from all sorts of sects. Wei Wuxian saved them and we all condemned him for it,' Lan Xichen thought. 'What Wangji's describing is bad, but… I may have tried to speak up for their side in the beginning, but I backed down far too easily. A toddler was living in those conditions. I'm one of the few people who could have done something about that. They're in the Burial Mounds now! Wei Wuxian didn't think he'd receive protection from us even though the people involved had never done anything wrong. The only place Wei Wuxian felt safe was one that had tried to kill him time and time again.'

How were they supposed to pass any sort of judgment now? What Lan Wangji was describing was bad, but how could they, right now, act like they were any better? What right did they have to punish anyone?

(However, they were the only ones here. No one was going to do it if they didn't.)

So:

"Wangji."

"Yes, Uncle?"

Lan Qiren paused for a moment, thinking carefully, then said, "You will be punished severely once we leave the simulation."

They had promised to not do anything against real people for things that hadn't yet occurred. However, upon hearing this statement, Lan Wangji only nodded once.

"I understand," he said.

In the back of the room, Jin Guangshan frowned deeply.

Then, at that moment, Jiang Yanli walked forward.

"Second Young Master Lan?" she asked.

He turned to face her.

"We once talked about doing meetings together. A-Xuan and I; A-Xian and you. If A-Xian happens to accept your presence in his life once more I would like to be present for your first few meetings," she requested. "And I'll be talking to A-Xian on my own as well."

"I understand," Lan Wangji said again.

But, before he could say anything more, they heard a strange sound. Something clicked around them.

“Hello, Sect Leaders. Disciples,” Wei Wuxian greeted them, voice light and cheery. “Uncle Jiang and I have someone to introduce to you!”

“I’m honored to meet you,” another person said. “This one’s name is Meng Yao.”

“A-Yao?!” Lan Xichen gaped.

“Meng Yao?” Jin Zixuan added on. “Is… is that really you?”

Both Wen Ruohan and Nie Mingjue froze.

“...It is. It’s an honor,” he said again.

The words were a bit stiff and awkward but, given the situation, it was understandable.

“He’s been doing well,” Jiang Fengmian added on. “A-Xian has been showing him around.”

And keeping an eye on him. Although every person in the conversation knew that to be true, no one said it out loud.

“Wei Wuxian,” Wen Qing spoke up. “Is A-Ning okay?”

“He is. He’s actually just in the next room if you want me to grab him for you. He’s taking care of some of the kids right now.”

“No. No, it’s okay,” Wen Qing said. “I’m sure… he’s safe with you.”

Safer than he was with almost anyone else.

“...Okay?” Wei Wuxian supposed. “I’m… glad you think that.”

“San-niang, how have you all been?” Jiang Fengmian asked. His words were a bit hesitant, fearful of a negative response.

“We’re… fine,” was all she said. “It’s going fine.”

Jiang Cheng turned red in shame, wanting desperately to confess something — though he wasn’t quite sure what — in the way Lan Wangji had done just a few minutes before. However, instead, time ticked on. His silence remained.

“...That sounds a bit like how we responded after seeing Wang Lingjiao arrive at Lotus Pier,” Jiang Fengmian observed. “Did something… similar happen?”

Something similar to the whole Jiang Sect being destroyed and Jiang Cheng, blaming Wei Wuxian, strangling him against the ground for it? Well, in some ways, it wasn’t quite that bad.

(And in other ways, it was almost worse.)

“...You could say that,” Jiang Cheng confessed.

“A-Die,” Jiang Yanli spoke up.

“Yes?”

“Could you…” she paused. “Could you give A-Xian a hug for me?”

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian did a double take.

“Now?” Jiang Fengmian asked.

“Yes, please.”

None of the watchers made any comments on the matter.

“...Okay,” Jiang Fengmian agreed.

“Eh? Uncle Jiang?!” Wei Wuxian eeped a little as Jiang Fengmian’s arms, presumably, wrapped around him.

“Thank you, A-Die,” Jiang Yanli said, a sad smile forming on her face. Seeing that, Jin Zixuan adopted the same expression, relaxing as he did. Things were going very, very badly, but… the whole point of watching this was that they’d be able to fix it. Things would be fine. They would make sure things were fine.

Some of that had to start now.

Then, at that moment, Madam Jin cleared her throat.

“...Meng Yao?”

“Yes?” he responded at once. He didn’t recognize her voice, but everyone in the simulation was more than influential. It was best to be as respectful as possible.

Madam Jin swallowed once. Meng Yao, inarguably, would do things that couldn’t be condoned. There were plenty of things that Madam Jin wouldn’t trust him with and there was far more reason to be suspicious than accepting. However…

If Wei Wuxian didn’t seem to deserve what Madam Yu did to him, then could Madam Jin really say it was fine that Meng Yao had been pushed down the stairs of Koi Tower?

“...Meng Yao, consider this an open invitation,” she said. “Once I am out of the simulation I would like you to come to Koi Tower if you wish. I… would like to meet you, if you have time.”

There were a telling few seconds of silence on the other end.

“Th-thank you, Madam Jin,” Meng Yao responded. “I will be sure to take you up on that. It is a tremendous offer.”

There wasn't a hint of deceptiveness in Meng Yao's tone but everyone knew he didn't trust Madam Jin even a little. And why would he? He had been thrown down Koi Tower, in part, because of her.

But the offer had been made. It would be up to Madam Jin, in the future, to prove herself trustworthy to him.

She glanced over at her husband, but found him looking away. He made no attempt to speak to Meng Yao or even acknowledge his presence, trying to distance himself from the young man as much as he could.

"...If it's a similar situation to that one, I'm sure you have a lot to think about," Jiang Fengmian said. "We'll give you some more time to talk, then."

"Okay," Madam Yu agreed, though no one still in the simulation had much else to say. The connection with the outside world disappeared and they were left alone once more.

Then, at last, Wen Qing spoke:

"I really hate the future."

"Agreed," everyone said. For perhaps the first time since the simulation began, the feeling was unanimous.

With a soft scrape of wood on wood, Hanguang-jun slid a door open. It was the entrance to the Sect Leader's chambers. Despite occasionally leaving his seclusion, Lan Xichen still spent most of his time inside.

"Xiongzhang," he said.

But Lan Xichen didn't seem to hear. He was working rapidly, writing across a scroll at a rapid pace. Piles and piles of books and discarded papers lay strewn around, lacking the discipline and grace Lan Wangji had admired in his brother for some many years. He walked in.

"Xiongzhang," he said again, kneeling down in front of his brother's table. Lan Xichen jumped.

"Ah, Wangji," he realized, not setting the quill down. "I didn't hear you come in. Is something wrong?"

Lan Wangji paused, looking around the room once more. Books were laid open, copious amounts of notes covering every page. The candle stick was nearly used up, the flame trying desperately to hold on as the wax melted below. Without saying a word, Lan Wangji reached over and changed it for a new one.

"...Xiongzhang, the juniors and I are going on a night hunt soon. You should join us."

Lan Xichen blinked, looking surprised by the suggestion, before giving a regretful smile and saying, “I would love to, Wangji. But I’m afraid I still have some work to finish. I will have to join you another time.”

Lan Wangji frowned.

“...What are you working on?” he asked.

“I’m just brainstorming more ideas for how to handle the situation in the past. We can’t risk anything that will let Da-ge die, of course, but I think if I keep looking carefully enough I’ll be able to ensure that Meng Yao stays alive too. If the past Wei Wuxian could keep track of them at all times then there won’t be any real risks in play.”

“...The past’s Wei Ying will most likely pay attention to Meng Yao,” Lan Wangji agreed. “That may be all we can ask for.”

“Yes, it will be hard to get him to do more, but that’s exactly what my brainstorming’s for. Our Wei Wuxian talked about using his inventions as a way to gain some pull in that world, didn’t he? If we can take advantage of that — if we can get both Da-ge and A-Yao to agree — then it will all work out.”

“...Wei Ying and I have talked about it. We both think we were a little too eager to change the past, initially. Since they’re the ones who will actually live there, it seems better to let the inhabitants of that world decide.”

“And what if they choose wrong?” Lan Xichen asked back. “What if they make all the same mistakes we did? What if, in giving them this chance, we just make everything worse? What then?”

“Then we’ll try to help them,” Lan Wangji said.

“I know, but… but I know myself. When it comes to Da-ge and A-Yao… when it comes to Meng Yao I always make the wrong choice. My other self will too. I have to at least try to help him! If I don't fix this-”

“Xiongzhang, they’re already dead!” Lan Wangji snapped.

Lan Xichen flinched back. When he finally looked up, he found Hanguang-jun staring back at him with a heavy gaze.

“...I apologize for interrupting you, Sect Leader,” Hanguang-jun said. “However… they have both already passed in our world. It is important to remember those we have lost and try to adjust our actions based on what we have learned, but… the future deserves our attention too.”

“I know that,” Lan Xichen confirmed. “I am. I just worry about the past as well.”

“You worry excessively.”

“I’m not.” Lan Xichen shook his head. “I know what I’m doing.”

“What you’re doing is living in the world of the dead,” Hanguang-jun said. “You’re living entirely for people who are already gone. I am happy you have tasks to occupy yourself with, but you cannot live only through them.”

At those words, Lan Xichen’s face lost much of its cheer.

“Wangji, that’s… that’s easy to say when the one you lost came back,” he pointed out. “Not everyone is so lucky.”

A slight tension formed in Lan Wangji’s brows.

“Wei Wuxian came back to life,” Lan Xichen added on. “This — the past — is the only way I can reach them.”

“...It took thirteen years for Wei Ying to come back. During that time, was I acting how you are now?”

Lan Xichen couldn’t move.

(How had Wangji acted during that time? What had he said? Had he ever done anything like trying to use the most beloved person in his brother’s life to help someone who was already gone?)

(No. A question like that didn’t even need to be answered.)

Guilt filled Lan Xichen’s soul.

“Xiongzhang, I’m not asking you to forget them. I’m not asking you to stop trying. However, there are people right in front of you that need you too. Most of the juniors haven’t seen their Sect Leader in months,” he said. “Please, come with them.”

“...I see. I…” Lan Xichen paused, then, slowly, nodded once. “I… I knew that.”

He paused again, thinking carefully.

“I… see your point.”

With a trembling hand, he slowly set his brush down.

“No, you’re right,” he decided. “Alright, Wangji, I’ll join you.”

Lan Wangji didn’t quite smile, but his brother could see the happiness that bloomed there anyways.

Living in a sect run by Wen Ruohan meant there was no room for incompetence. Wen Chao's mistakes were forgiven on account of him being a necessary spare (Wen Ruohan, unlike Jin Guangshan, was not especially interested in the process of having another kid). For everyone else however, there was no way to survive in the sect without being fully aware of how the world worked. Wen Qing had done her best to protect her brother from that, but even she could only shield him from so much. You had to have talent worth millions to remain safe in Wen Ruohan's world.

(It was no surprise, then, that Meng Yao thrived there so well.)

All of this was to say that Wen Qing had long since stopped considering herself to be naive. She wasn't a child. Wen Ruohan would do whatever he wanted; there was no point in her being sensitive to things she couldn't control.

So why, then, was she so overcome by a childish, illogical sense of injustice?

'It's not right. It's not fair,' her mind cried out. 'This can't be what happens. It shouldn't be like this, so soon in the future. A-Ning can't be dead. He did so much for Wei Wuxian — so much more for the Sunshot Campaign's side than most of those Sect Leaders did! I know my brother. We might have only seen him at the beginning of the war, but there's no way he hurt anyone. There's no way he could!'

(There had been no way.)

(Until, of course, he became a fierce corpse.)

But Wen Ning had done everything he could — had never done anything wrong. He was so kind, so good… didn't he deserve to live?

Sure, but since when had the world ever worked that way?

And what about Wei Wuxian?

Well, they already knew what would happen to him.

'Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian is dead!'

'Really? Who killed him?'

'Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, leader of the Jiang Clan.'

Wei Wuxian himself had confirmed that wasn't quite what happened.

However…

'Wei Wuxian has betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy! Yunmeng Jiang hereby expels him, breaking all ties and drawing a clear line between us! From now on, no matter what he does, it will have nothing to do with the Yunmeng Jiang Clan!'

~~If things continued down this path, and if Jiang Wanyin really did lead the siege against Wei Wuxian, then it seemed to Wen Qing that his involvement in Wei Wuxian's death was far from non-existent.~~

Nausea rose up within her.

'That's right, the sects are going to invade,' she thought. 'They're going to commence a siege on the Burial Mounds.'

Then what about A-Yuan? Granny? How had Wen Ning ended up imprisoned by the Jin Sect yet again? How, exactly, had Wei Wuxian died?

(Why, after all the terrible things they had seen so far, did she feel like things were only going to get worse?)

She wanted to leave. Her brother wasn't dead outside of the simulation — not yet — but anything could happen to him. How was she supposed to protect him if she was stuck here, unable to move in the outside world?

(But what if the simulation revealed something she needed to know to keep him safe?)

(But what if while she was here, learning to protect him from a distant threat, something happened to render all her effort meaningless? What if she came back to a corpse?)

Wei Wuxian would protect him, surely. There was almost no one she could trust with her brother more than Wei Wuxian. And her brother would protect him.

(But what if?)

Countless fears gripped at her heart.

And thus, when the room began to darken once more, Wen Qing felt her blood freeze.

Brief flashes were shown once again, depicting the fight that had occurred between Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng. Countless blows were thrown, most of them missing by what appeared to be just luck. However, no injuries at all would have been suspicious. Wen Ning broke Jiang Cheng's arm. Jiang Cheng stabbed Wei Wuxian in the gut.

Just like Jin Ling had — would — in a future that now felt more real than ever before. Jiang Cheng looked away.

Ouyang Zizhen cleared his throat, announcing, "After the fight, because of the brutality of Wen Ning's performance, he was given a somewhat unfortunate nickname. However, that is a story for later-"

"Then why are you mentioning it now?" Jin Ling hissed.

"Because it's cool!" Ouyang Zizhen hissed back.

Though Lan Qiren couldn't see them, he was certain Lan Jingyi was nodding rapidly in agreement. The idea of the juniors — those children — being so cavalier about all this left a bad taste in his mouth. The things they had been told about this part of Wei Wuxian's life were quite different from what the watchers were being shown now, even if the overall story stayed the same.

"Anyways, although Sect Leader Jiang stabbed him in the stomach, Senior Wei wasn't concerned at all!"

The simulation shifted to show Wei Wuxian, his wound on full display.

Jiang Yanli flinched back. A bout of nausea came over Jiang Cheng.

However, Wei Wuxian merely stuffed his intestines back inside, giving a smile as if nothing had happened at all. He ordered Wen Ning to go hunt down a few spirits, picking up a large sack of potatoes on the way.

With his pitch-black robes, the blood was hard to see.

But that didn't mean it wasn't there. Lan Wangji narrowed his eyes and Wen Qing had to force herself to not run over. Illusion or not, the wound certainly looked realistic. And, within the simulation, her other-self would have access to none of the medical equipment Wen Qing had on her right now.

Wei Wuxian would be…

And without his core-

That theory of hers could still be entirely off. She might be reading too far into this. Baoshan Sanren could be real and know thousands of techniques Wen Qing had never even dreamed of before.

But-

"When they returned to the Burial Mounds, Wen Qing bandaged his wounds and scolded him as fiercely as possible, reminding him that it was radishes he had been told to buy."

No one so much as cracked a smile at that.

“After this, there came a number of ordinary days. Everyone lived in peace with one another. In the Burial Mounds, Senior Wei and the fifty-or-so Wens planted vegetables, made houses, refined corpses, and made new tools.”

Things they wouldn’t have to do if the sects had cared at all about what was actually right, in Nie Mingjue’s opinion. Despite that, all the flashes of scenes they saw showed people smiling brightly. Even Wei Wuxian, recently stabbed though he might be, looked more relaxed than he’d been before.

(And what did that say about the world — the people — he’d just left?)

“As the months passed, the rumors surrounding Wei Wuxian got worse and worse.”

“Months?” Lan Xichen repeated, his mouth falling open a little in shock. Although the last segment had dashed many of his hopes, he had still half-expected that, in the next few days, his other self would come down to the burial mounds. If the other Lan Xichen saw what was going on, changes could be made.

(But Jiang Cheng, who had gone down to the mounds, claimed Wei Wuxian was an enemy of the sects. Why would Lan Xichen need to investigate more?)

Even then, surely they would all be worried about what Wei Wuxian was going to do. Did they really investigate him so little as to not notice the toddler?! What was the other Lan Xichen doing, then?

‘Probably playing around with Jin Guangyao,’ something in the back of his mind said. The thought filled Lan Xichen with a new wave of concern.

And that only increased as the rumors themselves became known.

“Did you hear? Wei Wuxian, the Yiling Patriarch, has surrounded the Burial Mounds with fierce corpses. No one can get in!”

The other guests at the tavern leaned closer, a mix of fear and anticipation on their faces. With cheeks flushed from alcohol, they breathed heavily, their excitement growing.

“What do you think he’s doing up there?”

“What do you mean, ‘what is he doing?!’ Obviously, he’s building an army!”

“And snatching up all the women he can find, I bet!” a round-bellied man exclaimed, downing another jar of alcohol as he did. “Ah, though you don’t have to worry, Xiao-jie. I bet he only goes after the pretty ones.”

The woman to his left rolled her eyes, slapping him playfully on his head, then grew a bit more somber as she said, “The righteous sects will stop him soon, won’t they? My little sister doesn’t feel safe going even just as far as the Chang lake anymore. She’s been making the merchants she’s with take the long way around.”

“Good on her! I’ve heard the patriarch’s kidnapped over a hundred women by now!”

“I’ve heard it was over a thousand!”

“I heard the Madam telling her children to not go out late at night or else the Patriarch will catch them! Do you think he’s hunting down children too?”

“Must be. That sounds like exactly the kind of thing he’d do.”

A waitress arrived, asking, “Anyone up for another round?”

The tavern guests nodded at once, allowing their cups to be refilled.

But, despite the lull in conversation, none of the watchers felt like talking. Even Jin Guangshan could only give a small sigh, frustrated at the result. Wei Wuxian becoming completely cut off from the world didn’t really benefit anyone — not in the long run. And yet, that was exactly what was happening now.

“Businesses really are suffering from this. My cousin’s also been forced to go the long way around,” one guest said.

Another guest nodded, adding, “Anyone even somewhat-wealthy in Yiling is getting out of there as fast as they can. After all, all the wealth in the world won’t help them against a cultivator like him.”

“Ah, it’s so scary! I really do hope the sects will take care of him soon!” the young lady sighed.

“Don’t you worry,” the round-bellied man laughed. “They’ll take that traitor and his Wen-dogs and stick their damn heads on pikes for all of us to see!”

A round of drunken laughter spread around the table at that.

And Wen Qing shuddered slightly, the words of these random civilians enough to make her blood run cold.

“Still, be careful Xiao-jie,” a young man requested. “Who knows what he’s getting up to even as we speak!”

The other guests nodded. Behind them, a variety of images appeared depicting what they each thought Wei Wuxian might be doing at that very moment. Death, destruction, experimentation, armies — the possibilities seemed endless.

The watchers tensed.

The world darkened then lit again. Now, the Burial Mounds took shape before their eyes. There were cloudy skies, rocky grounds, and the caws of crows echoing in the distance. Resentful energy loomed throughout the valley, brushing against the watchers’ skin. It was much less wild than the Burial Mounds had initially been, but resentful energy could only really be eased — never forced into compliance. Even now, lulled into obedience by Wei Wuxian's song, it seemed to sneak around, searching for its next kill.

Then, there was a twitch.

It had been given a command.

'Up,' the resentful energy seemed to say. 'Get up.'

Why? A call for help? What was Wei Wuxian doing?

'Up.'

Wen Qing shuddered slightly, feeling the energy dance around her once more.

What was happening in the Burial Mounds?

The answer to that question came a moment later. There was a flash of red — a renewed call of resentful energy. The ground began to shake with the force of a thousand steps. There was a cry in the distance.

Uncle Four.

Wen Qing's heart skipped a beat.

'No. No, no.' She got up, stepping away from her seat. 'No, it can't be — the sects can't be here already! I... A-Ning, A-Yuan, Wei Wuxian-'

The cries became louder and louder.

Auntie Two. Granny Wen. More and more voices entered into the symphony.

And Wen Qing marched forward, muttering a desperate, "No, no, no-"

There was a child's scream.

"A-Yuan!"

"Wei Wuxian! Stop right now!" the simulated Wen Qing screamed. Wei Wuxian's laughter was heard next. When he appeared, smile bright and wide, he was dodging Wen Qing's violently-swinging garden hoe. The most striking part of all would, of course, have to be his mode of transportation. He was riding atop a…

Well, it was a…

To put it in simple terms:

"Is that… a radish?" Nie Mingjue asked, staring blankly.

"Wei Wuxian! Stop! Stop now! When I get my hands on you-"

But Wei Wuxian barely seemed to be listening to Wen Qing's threats, cackling openly as she continued her chase. What he sat atop did, by any metric, appear to be a giant radish. However, this radish seemed to have grown in a strange, deformed manner that made it resemble an elderly man's face. Several parts of it were sticking out unevenly to serve as limbs. It sped ahead, fleeing Wen Qing's garden-tool based attacks with all its might. To the side, A-Yuan continued to scream, fleeing from a bouncing set of giant peas. In fact, all around, the feared Wen remnants were being assaulted by a variety of anthropomorphized vegetables and roots.

Lan Jingyi cleared his throat.

"To understand this current situation, we must go back to some time ago."

"...What additional information could we be given to make that any more reasonable?!" Lan Qiren demanded, slowly breaking out of his shock. Most everyone else was still frozen, not knowing what to say.

Then, at long last, Nie Mingjue said what everyone was thinking:

"What?!"

Nie Huaisang snorted once and then began to laugh.

What appeared next was Wei Wuxian, inside his cave, standing over Wen Ning's corpse.

Wen Qing flinched back as if slapped, not prepared for the sight of that.

Every visible inch of Wen Ning's body was covered in talismans, all drawn in blood. They pulsed with resentful energy, warm, welcoming, and strangely soft despite what that energy was.

The watchers had mostly grown used to feeling resentful energy by this point. That said, when faced with resentful energy as strange as what was here, it was hard to not be surprised.

Sweat was starting to fall down Wei Wuxian's face. Fatigue was clear in his expression, and his hand trembled just a little where he held it out. He was slightly thinner now, having no easy supply of food in the Burial Mounds.

Much like the last time he had ended up there. Once again, it was because of the Wens.

Wen Ruohan looked over the surroundings coldly.

(Though Wei Wuxian was slightly thinner than the last time they had seen him, he was much better off than when Wen Chao — when Wen Ruohan's orders — got him thrown in there the first time around. That said, this was still the Burial Mounds. Nothing about the current situation could be considered okay.)

After a few moments longer, Wei Wuxian let out a small sigh. Realizing he was too exhausted to perform the energy manipulation properly anymore, he lowered his hand.

The Yiling Patriarch then stumbled to the side, drinking from a chipped cup filled with water he had been keeping nearby. Once it was empty, he headed out.

In the valleys of the Burial Mounds, the elderly Wens were hard at work. They swung hammers as well as they could, crafting the furniture and houses they would need to live there. It wasn't like they could hire anyone to help them, after all. The rest of the Wens plowed dirt, sowing seeds with careful diligence.

Wei Wuxian walked through the steadily-forming town, a small smile on his face. He moved past the construction area and into the farms, pausing near one of the elderly men.

"Uncle Four," Wei Wuxian greeted.

"Ah, Wei-gongzi," the man said back. "What do you think? Shall we try to plow the entirety of the Burial Mounds today?"

"Of course! We want our crops to do well, don't we?"

Uncle Four nodded back, agreeing, "Certainly. A-Yuan's going to eat us dry, otherwise. A growing boy needs his food! And you too, come to think of it! You're only what? Twenty or so?"

Wei Wuxian tilted his head in acknowledgement, accepting the other's concern.

The watchers could all recall how the Wens had seemed when Wei Wuxian first saved them. The fear in their eyes had been impossible to deny. 'The Yiling Patriarch' was perhaps the most terrifying being they could imagine.

Now, however…

Lan Wangji smiled just slightly, noticing the Wens relaxing in Wei Wuxian's presence instead.

Wei Wuxian opened his mouth to speak again, only to cut off when a small figure crashed headfirst into his leg, a doll of scraps in his hand. Little A-Yuan wrapped around Wei Wuxian's body, holding the bundle of stray fabric up for him to see.

"This!" he said.

Putting on an annoyed attitude, hands on his hips and all, Wei Wuxian scolded, "A-Yuan, quit it."

But A-Yuan was not deterred, requesting, "Speak!"

This time, Wei Wuxian couldn't quite manage to keep a fond smile from showing on his face. He rolled his eyes once then nodded, conceding defeat.

"Alright then. Let go of me," he requested, taking the scrap-monster from the toddler. He slipped two of his fingers inside, tilting it so that the two pieces of white and black fabric on top looked like eyes. Then, kneeling down next to A-Yuan, he moved it this way and that, turning the puppet into a terrifying creature on the hunt for its prey. It then pounced on a giggling A-Yuan, just barely missing him. It tried again! With every failed attempt the tiger made, A-Yuan's laughter grew that much louder.

Jiang Yanli smiled, watching the scene. Wei Wuxian had always had a special amount of fun teaching their youngest disciples. Yanli had always thought Wei Wuxian would make a wonderful uncle for her child. The simulation had only made her more certain of that. Jin Ling — prickly and passionate and determined and so, so willing to change once Wei Wuxian entered his life — would love his uncle dearly.

Under normal circumstances.

(As she now recalled, Jin Ling had tried to kill Wei Wuxian last they had seen.)

Jiang Yanli shook her head. The fact that Jin Ling was one of the four who sent these memories back to them was more than enough proof that he regretted what he had done. There was no need to dwell on that before they found out what was going on.

(And yet the look of shock that had crossed Wei Wuxian's face when Jin Ling's blade sunk into his skin — the attack landing in the exact same spot Jiang Cheng's had during their fake battle one segment ago — had not left her mind.)

"Here you are now. Go play with this," Wei Wuxian said, trying to hand the toy back. However, as soon as he did, A-Yuan latched onto his leg again, squeezing tightly.

Wen Qing wondered if, outside the simulation, her brother was now playing with children just like this. He and Wei Wuxian had been left in charge of quite a number of kids, after all.

A-Yuan refused to let go.

"A-Yuan," Wei Wuxian said warningly. "If you insist on sticking to me like this, I'll plant you in the field as a turnip!"

At those words, A-Yuan did indeed let go. However, rather than running away, he went over to where his Fourth Uncle was still plowing the field, sitting down in the middle of the freshly-tilled dirt.

Laughing, Wei Wuxian observed, "A-Yuan… you really want to be a turnip? Alright then, stay still! If you start moving, I won't be able to plant you."

In response, A-Yuan began piling some of the loose dirt around there onto himself.

"Alright, here we go," Wei Wuxian announced, kneeling down to throw some dirt on as well. "I'll plant a big turnip today. After several days, many turnips will grow out. Then everyone can eat to their heart's content!"

"But I'm not a turnip," A-Yuan protested.

Wei Wuxian paused, considered that for a moment, then declared, "We'll plant a child here then! If we water the child, give him enough fertilizer, and let him enjoy the sun often, we can grow many children!"

A-Yuan laughed.

'Is his understanding of gardening or childbirth a greater cause for concern?' Madam Jin wondered, huffing a laugh. Behind her, Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes. It was a little ridiculous for them to all be watching this. Surely, they had more important things they could see.

Then again, he couldn't really say he disliked this either. Kids had never been his thing, but it was still nice.

(His other-self had just declared Wei Wuxian an enemy to all the sects. It was somewhat reassuring to know that this was what came after.)

The Yiling Patriarch's grand plan had not reached its conclusion yet, however.

Wei Wuxian continued, "We'll water the new children well and get more from them, too. Soon, we'll be able to make an entire field of children!"

Upon hearing that, A-Yuan declared, "I want three older brothers and two older sisters."

"No problem!" Wei Wuxian assured, snapping his fingers together. "We'll give A-Yuan three elder brothers and two older sisters!"

"Will they look like me or turnips?" A-Yuan asked, sounding genuinely concerned.

"Given how the first scene played out, it seems they'll look more like turnips to me," Nie Huaisang declared. Madam Yu sighed, still having many, many questions about that.

Which was not helped when Wei Wuxian hummed for a while before frowning and responding, "It's hard to say. Shall we find out?"

He snapped once more. One of the corpses that had been lingering around snapped to attention.

Try as they might, most of the watchers couldn't help but sit up straighter, too.

The corpse then came over as fast as it could, attacking the ground at lightning speed. It wouldn't be able to do something as delicate and exact as planting crops, but, if its only job was making a hole, then it could manage. Soon, an excavation large enough to fit a giggling A-Yuan inside was made. He was plopped in and buried shortly after, Wei Wuxian laughing all the while.

"Wei Wuxian, what are you doing?" Wen Qing asked, walking over. Gone were the expensive, sun-decorated robes she once wore. Now, firmer, thicker fabrics covered her body, a bucket of water resting in her hands. Nonetheless, Wei Wuxian startled as if he'd been found by a vengeful god. He looked away, scratching awkwardly at the back of his neck as she marched over.

"Aunt," A-Yuan greeted. "We're trying to grow elder brothers and sisters here."

Wen Qing looked unimpressed.

Suddenly, something seemed to occur to Wei Wuxian. He spun toward A-Yuan once more, asking, "A-Yuan, how about we grow you some more aunts? If we get more of those, we'll have a much larger labor force!"

"Ah!" A-Yuan nodded rapidly in agreement.

Simultaneously, both the real and simulated Wen Qings rolled their eyes.

'Honestly,' she thought with a fond sigh. 'You better wake up soon, A-Ning. My simulated self will need your help if she wants to watch over Wei Wuxian.'

"Alright, that's enough," Wen Qing declared, walking over and picking A-Yuan out of the dirt. "It'll be dinner time soon. Go wash up."

Pouting a little, A-Yuan complied.

Night fell and everyone began shutting down. The only sources of light under the perpetually cloudy sky were the torches the Wens had created earlier. A collection of dried-out twigs and leaves too thin and worn to generate much light laid scattered around the mounds. Right now, the Wens didn't even have enough money for candles.

Wen Qing sat within Wei Wuxian's cave, resting by her brother's side. He was still dead — nothing would change that — but now, at least, she could be with him. Wen Qing reached forward, grabbing hold of his ~~cold, dead~~ hand.

'A-Ning,' she thought softly. 'If, back then… if Wei Wuxian hadn't-'

She cut off, not allowing herself to finish that thought.

The real Wen Qing swallowed once, equally unwilling to consider the possibilities.

But then, in the cloud of resentful energy below, she heard a groan.

"-ie."

She sat up straight at once, crying out, "A-Ning?"

Wen Qing stood again and, to her left, Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes.

The groaning continued, sounding far more pained than most fierce corpses' cries did. He trembled a little, his wails becoming more and more desperate over time.

"A-Ning!" Wen Qing shouted.

But her words couldn't reach him.

He was dead, after all. But…

Unable to stop herself, Wen Qing stood up and walked toward the corpse — toward her brother — stopping just beyond where her other-self was. She reached forward, her fingers passing through Wen Ning's form like he was made of mist. Out of the corner of her eye, she saw Lan Wangji step up beside her. He understood her frustration.

That didn't matter though. Right now, all Wen Qing could see was Wen Ning.

The corpse's thrashing became increasingly frantic. He was only being held down by the tightly sealed talismans sticking to every centimeter of his skin. Despite the bindings, he shook wildly.

His cries continued.

And the pain in them was hard to miss. Jin Zixuan clenched his hands into fists but forced himself to keep looking.

(Wen Ning had been beaten to death by the Jins, after all. He had no right to turn away.)

"Gah! Ah! Ah!" Wen Ning screamed.

"A-Ning!"

"-urts. Ah! A-"

"I'm right here! Jiejie is here! A-Ning!"

It seemed like Wen Qing's cries were going unheard.

Madam Yu watched with a complicated gaze. Without this boy, her and her husband's ashes would have been scattered into the wind. Her son and Wei Wuxian might have died as well. And now…

"Ah! Ah! Ah! A-"

A single note rang out, stretching across the entirety of the mounds.

"Ah! Ah!"

"Ah!"

"Ah. Ah, ah-"

The melody was soothing and calm. Each individual note played for a long time, coming together into a song that resembled the slow, smooth paths of ripples on a pond. Combined with the forced lull of the music's command, it was no surprise that Wen Ning's struggles began to stop.

"Ah," he muttered one final time, returning to rest.

Wen Qing looked out.

The watchers were moved out of the cave, across several houses, to the roof of one of the shacks still under construction. Wei Wuxian sat there, playing on his flute with a serenity that seemed fundamentally opposed to resentful energy and yet fit Wei Wuxian perfectly.

The watchers couldn't help but calm as well. At long last, Wen Qing seemed able to breathe.

As Wen Ruohan watched her reactions, a strange feeling came over him. Unlike Wen Qing, Wen Ning had never displayed any true potential or use. His stuttering manner of speech and general unwillingness to stand out all culminated in someone only useful as, at most, a hostage. It had seemed like that was all there was to him. When the simulation began, revealing Wen Ning as a powerful fierce corpse, Wen Ruohan had felt nothing but excitement. Finally, the boy appeared to have some use.

But…

Wen Ning had a skill with archery that, if nurtured, could have saved them the embarrassment the archery tournament had been. He had a form of bravery that only revealed itself when there was something that truly needed to be done. He was pitifully lacking in ambition, but it wasn't quite right to say he only had use after death.

(A fierce corpse would be too stiff to perform archery and too brainless to show true loyalty. For every benefit the Ghost General brought, there was a cost in what Wen Ning had lost.)

'I wanted the sects under me to show them where they belonged,' Wen Ruohan recalled. 'People that stupid — people that thoughtless — needed to be controlled.'

But that wasn't all of it.

'My sons… Xu-er has some talent, but, without me, he would never know what to do. If he was in charge of all the sects, things would continue as they are. If Chao-er were in charge…'

He didn't even need to think about that.

'The Wen Sect is strong now, but, in the next few generations, it could lose all of that. It did lose, in the simulation. Something had to be done. I needed to establish it as a force no one could oppose. It wasn't like the sects had ever stopped me before.'

However…

Wen Ning had been right there, and Wen Ruohan had ignored him all this time. If Wen Ning had been utilized properly and if the archery tournament had ended differently, Wen Ruohan might not have escalated things so soon.

(How many things — how many people — had Wen Ruohan had at his disposal and yet never thought to use?)

Those thoughts continued to linger in Wen Ruohan's mind as the simulation went on. Wei Wuxian's song continued to play, setting the entirety of the Burial Mounds at ease. Wen Ning had been set to rest once more.

The watchers had finally managed to resettle as well. Just in the nick of time, too. For, at that moment, their narration began again:

"Although things appeared to stabilize in the following days, A-Yuan's days of being buried were far from over," Lan Jingyi announced, lowering his voice ominously at the last few words.

The simulation shifted once more, taking them forward in time. The first one that appeared was little A-Yuan. Or, rather, A-Yuan's head. The rest of him was buried deep in the earth, leaving only what was above his neck. He cried out at his perilous situation, but Wei Wuxian only laughed from the side.

"Every day when Senior Wei was free, he would play with the toddler Wen Yuan, son of Wen Qing's cousin," Lan Sizhui said, his voice, for a moment, shaking just a little. "He'd either help him hang on trees or bury him in the ground, telling him that he'd grow faster if he was watered and bathed in sunlight. Then, Wen Qing would scold him again."

And indeed she did, marching over and shouting at the top of her lungs. The sight made A-Yuan smile at last.

They switched scenes again. Wei Wuxian and A-Yuan were now in the middle of Yiling, perusing through the market stalls.

"Senior Wei couldn't go down the mountain often. Since he was the only one who could suppress all the resentful energy in the Burial Mounds, he couldn't venture out too far or for too long. However, he was an active person who grew restless when staying in one place for an extended period of time. He would roam around town from time to time, excusing it as purchasing necessities. And Wen… um, Wen Yuan had been on the mountain for a long time. Senior Wei felt they shouldn't keep a child in a place with nothing but mud all the time so, one day, he took Wen Yuan shopping with him."

Madam Yu turned her gaze upon the pair, confliction twisting within her. When Jiang Fengmian had taken Wei Wuxian in, it had been because that boy was the son of his best friend. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, had protected Wen Yuan and the other Wens simply because it was the right thing to do. Protecting them was more than anyone could have expected him to do. The child had family left; Granny Wen was somewhat frail, but there were still plenty of people who could look after him.

Wei Wuxian didn't have to.

But he wanted to, so he did.

Wei Wuxian walked through the town confidently, quite familiar with it thanks to his many excursions. Soon, he arrived at a vegetable vendor whose stall contained a large crate of potatoes. Wei Wuxian inspected them carefully, turning them around in his hand, then suddenly grabbed one to the side.

"Vendor, your potato is sprouting!" he declared, holding it up.

The vendor's relaxed body language vanished at those words. He straightened up as if looking at his greatest foe.

"What do you want?" he snapped.

"Can you make this a little cheaper?"

"You want those potatoes?!" Jiang Cheng gaped, aghast. "Get something else!"

Jin Zixuan nodded rapidly in agreement and Lan Xichen stared with wide eyes.

Wei Wuxian went from vendor to vendor, buying and bargaining where he could. A-Yuan stayed attached to his leg the whole while, clinging on tightly. However, as time passed by and Wei Wuxian's shopping continued, his arms started to get a little tired. Now, whenever Wei Wuxian came to a stop at one of the stalls, A-Yuan would let go momentarily, only grabbing on again when it was time for Wei Wuxian to move. They picked up carrots and containers and some hemp for the grannies to weave cloth out of and some clay to fix up the roofs and then, by the time they reached the yams, A-Yuan's exhaustion led him to let go of Wei Wuxian mid-stride. He had only been intending to let go for a second but, in that second, a crowd of people crossed in front of him, cutting off his view of Wei Wuxian. By the time they were gone, A-Yuan's protector was nowhere to be seen.

"Oh dear," Lan Qiren murmured.

Nie Mingjue frowned minutely in concern and Jiang Yanli squeezed her hands together tightly. A child getting separated from their guardian in town, while concerning, wasn't that surprising either. These sorts of things happened from time to time; it would probably be dealt with soon. Despite that, Jin Zixuan felt his heart rate double in speed.

(Who knew what other lies his sect had spread about the Wens. If the camp run by his family was willing to have a toddler there then, for all Jin Zixuan knew, any random person on this street might be willing to chop A-Yuan's head off if they found out who he was. If Jin Zixuan couldn't even trust his own family…)

(On the other hand, there was also the possibility that his sect was just uniquely awful. Jin Zixuan wasn't sure which option he feared more.)

A-Yuan began spinning around, searching for Wei Wuxian's legs to grab onto. However, every towering body around him looked identical, the dirt-covered pants forming a perplexing maze that trapped A-Yuan inside. He grew more and more scared at every moment, spinning around dizzily. He stumbled to the side.

And bumped into a pair of white legs.

"Huh?" Lan Xichen sat up.

But, before they could see who was wearing white robes on the dirty streets of Yiling, they returned to Wei Wuxian. He stood tall, looking around desperately for the toddler he had lost. His face had gone pale, deep worry etched onto it.

Which made sense. A child getting lost in the middle of a crowded town was definitely something to be concerned about.

(Most especially because of who that child was.)

Jin Zixuan felt his stomach do a unhappy flip.

Suddenly, a few wails rang out. Wei Wuxian turned toward the sound at once, pushing through the crowd as quickly as he could. Soon, he found himself in a group of bustling passer-bys gathered in a circle. Wei Wuxian shoved them aside then froze, realizing who was in the center.

Lan Wangji stood equally frozen, a bawling A-Yuan at his feet.

A chuckle. Then a snort.

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue scolded.

But that berate only served to make Nie Huaisang double over in laughter, clutching at his sides. Lan Wangji's ears flushed a bright pink and most of the other watchers could only gape.

Had they ever seen Hanguang-jun looking so… lost?

Nie Huaisang could barely breathe.

"Wangi-xiong, you seem so confused! This is amazing! You look like a father who's left home for months coming back to find out he has a kid!"

"It's not his kid!" Jiang Cheng pointed out.

"It might as well be!"

Which wasn't really fair. At this point in time, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were, at best, friendly acquaintances. Wei Wuxian had an immense respect for Lan Wangji, and Lan Wangji — given what the real one had confessed to at the end of the last segment — was already falling in love. However, neither of them had admitted as much to each other. It would be difficult for them to even describe themselves as friends.

Still, after watching the far-future, that was hard to keep in mind.

Much like Nie Huaisang, Wei Wuxian was also doubled over in laughter at this sight, almost tripping over his own feet in the process. A-Yuan was still bawling his eyes out at Lan Wangji's side, leaving Hanguang-jun looking somewhat overwhelmed.

All around, covering up the sound of Wei Wuxian's laughter, the passer-bys talked amongst themselves:

"What's happenin' here? The young'un cried so hard it scared me to death."

Nodding once with a sagely wisdom, an elderly man declared, "He was definitely scolded by his dad."

"See?! See?! It wasn't just me! They see it too!"

"Huaisang, be quiet!"

But Wei Wuxian had heard the old man's comment too, and his laughter only increased at those words.

Lan Wangji felt heat rising to his face. However, as he looked back and forth between his other self, A-Yuan, and the beaming Wei Wuxian, he couldn't help but feel a bit of jealousy as well.

(A-Yuan would probably — hopefully — have parents in their world. If so, something like this would never happen. It was a scene he would only ever be able to view from someone else's point of view.)

The simulated Lan Wangji felt none of the longing the real one did. Having heard the accusation of fatherhood, he looked up at the speaker with a stern frown.

"I am not," he declared.

However, Wen Yuan didn't know what everyone was talking about. All he knew was how terrified he was. Thus, out of instinct, he began to cry out:

"Dad! Dad! Dad!" he bawled.

"Ha!"

"See? I told you he's his dad!"

"Definitely his dad. Their noses look as if they were carved out of the same mold!"

Lan Qiren sighed.

“How sad. Look at how that little one’s crying. He was definitely scolded by his dad, huh.”

Huffing in annoyance, a woman added, “He doesn’t even know to pick up the child to make him feel better! He’s just going to let his son cry on the ground? What a dad!”

Lan Qiren sighed once more, louder this time, and Lan Wangji lowered his head in shame.

“Well, look at how young he is. I understand. First time being a dad, huh? I was like this back then too. I didn’t know anything. He’ll get the hang of it after his wife bears a few more.”

“Sounds like Wei-xiong has his work cut out for him~” Nie Huaisang sing-songed, making Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng choke on their own spit. Lan Wangji, by principle, was doing his best to ignore everything that came out of Nie Huaisang’s mouth, but even he couldn’t help but gape a little at that.

Nie Mingjue just gave a tired facepalm, no longer having the energy to circumvent his brother’s enthusiasm.

Meanwhile, Wen Ruohan watched the scene with a subtle, uncharacteristically small smile.

Some more concerned passers knelt down by the child, whispering, “Shh. Don’t cry.”

“Are you okay?”

“Where’s your mom?”

From behind: “Yeah, where’s the mom?! The dad isn’t doing anything, so where’s the mom?!”

At that question, even Jiang Yanli couldn’t help but glance Wei Wuxian’s way.

Wei Wuxian’s laughter was still going strong. However, seeing that A-Yuan was starting to cry so much that he couldn’t breathe, Wei Ying forced himself to stop. He stood up and pushed his way through the crowd.

“Huh? Lan Zhan?” Wei Wuxian asked, pretending he hadn’t been watching and laughing at Lan Wangji for the past three minutes. Lan Wangji looked over at once, eyes wide. They stared at each other for a moment before Wei Wuxian, strangely flustered, looked away. At the same time, A-Yuan looked over, finally finding a voice he recognized. He jumped up, running over with tears in his eyes to grab onto Wei Wuxian’s leg.

“Dad! Dad!” he cried.

A-Yuan had never met Lan Wangji before. While he was grabbing onto Hanguang-jun’s leg, the “Dad!” he was calling out for was, almost certainly, Wei Wuxian. As Wen Qing watched her soon-to-be-born cousin holding on tightly to Wei Wuxian's leg, she felt a smile form on her face. First with Wen Ning and now with A-Yuan… Wei Wuxian was sliding into her family so naturally it felt like he'd been there since birth. How strange that, now that Wen Qing thought about it, she still hadn't actually met Wei Wuxian in person.

Soon, she promised herself.

The gathered peanut gallery observed A-Yuan's behavior with a far more critical lens:

"What? Who is this? Where's the mom? Where on earth is the mom?" they asked. "Which one is the dad?"

"Alright, alright. It's over," Wei Wuxian said, waving his hand in a shooing motion. Many frowned at the dismissal, but, after a bit, the crowd dispersed. They were here to see a spectacle but they weren't so interested as to forcefully stay.

If Lan Wangji were anyone else, he would have surely let out a sigh of relief.

Having scattered the crowd, Wei Wuxian looked back and said, "What a coincidence, Lan Zhan. Why are you in Yiling?"

"A night hunt," Lan Wangji responded. "I was passing by."

'Or were you just concerned for Young Master Wei?' Lan Xichen wondered giddily, then, frowning slightly, continued, 'No. Even if he was concerned, the night hunt probably isn't a lie. With the Yiling Patriarch now considered a threat, I don't imagine Wangji can just go visit him whenever he pleases.'

They were no longer teenagers playing within the Cloud Recesses. At the very least, Lan Qiren would surely object to a friendly excursion with the Yiling Patriarch. Lan Wangji would only be able to go over unhindered if he had a separate excuse.

(In saving a child's life, Wei Wuxian had turned himself into an enemy of the Lan Sect. If Lan Xichen had heard such an absurd thing before the simulation began, he would have had no choice but to laugh.)

By now, the crowd had almost entirely dispersed. Everyone had gone back to the shopping they were doing before, granting Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji some privacy at long last. Hanguang-jun looked down, focusing on the small figure still clutching Wei Wuxian's leg.

"The child?" he asked.

"Mine," Wei Wuxian confirmed.

There was a pause. A beat went by. Then…

"Wait… wait, what?!"

Lan Wangji's brows twitched.

Then, act breaking, Wei Wuxian laughed, "Of course I'm joking! He's someone else's. I took him out to play."

"Obviously!" Jiang Cheng shouted. "How did you say something like that so straightforwardly?!"

But Wei Wuxian had already gotten the amusement he wanted out of his little joke and so moved on to ask, "What did you do? How did you make him cry?"

"I did not do anything," Lan Wangji protested.

Wen Yuan hugged Wei Wuxian's leg, still sobbing. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian nodded a few times in understanding.

'It makes sense,' he supposed. 'Although Lan Zhan has a pretty face, such a young child won't be able to distinguish a beautiful one from any other. All he was able to see was that this person wasn't friendly at all. In fact, Lan Zhan probably looks rather cold and strict. It's only natural he felt scared after seeing that.'

A strange feeling of guilt filled Lan Wangji.

A-Yuan's eyes widened as he was picked up, his sobs coming to a halt when Wei Wuxian began bouncing him up and down.

"Shh. You're alright now," Wei Wuxian whispered warmly. "There, there."

For all that Nie Huaisang had (hopefully) just been joking earlier, Madam Yu could see his point. As much as she hated to admit it, Wei Wuxian really did seem like A-Yuan's father.

~~Then again, after the disaster her and Jiang Fengmian's marriage had turned into, Madam Yu supposed she was the last person who should be consulted on what a family should look like.~~

To the side, one vendor was still chuckling, amused by the scene. Upon noticing that, Wei Wuxian walked over to him and leaned to give a-Yuan a good look at the paper butterflies, pinwheels, rattle drums, and other trinkets.

"Look over here, A-Yuan. Isn't it pretty?" he asked.

Wen Yuan's focus shifted towards them and, sniffling, he mumbled, "...Yeah."

"Don't they smell nice?"

"Yeah," the boy nodded, enthusiasm growing.

Taking advantage of the opportunity, the vendor cut in, "They look good and smell nice. Young Master, won't you buy one?"

Wei Wuxian glanced over at the now-smiling A-Yuan to ask, "Do you want one?"

"Yeah!" A-Yuan nodded, somewhat embarrassed.

Wei Wuxian laughed at his reaction, nodding once and saying, "Then, let's go."

He walked away.

Jin Zixuan did a double take.

"Huh?!" he gaped, looking back and forth between Wei Wuxian and the slack-jawed vendor. "Wait, what?!"

Jiang Yanli laughed lightly, amused by both Wei Wuxian's ridiculous behavior and her fiance's reaction. Jiang Cheng, meanwhile, rolled his eyes, caught between amusement, disbelief, and annoyance at the scene.

"How bored are you — messing with a little kid like that. Just buy it for him! It's the least you can do!"

Poor A-Yuan, shocked by the trick Wei Wuxian played on him, could do nothing but stare back at the vendor with wide eyes. Tears began to form.

Then, like a savior clad in white, Lan Wangji stepped forward.

"Why don't you buy it for him?" he asked.

"Why should I buy it for him?" Wei Wuxian responded, not missing a beat.

"You asked whether he wanted one or not. Didn't that imply you were going to get one for him?"

Jiang Cheng, Jin Zixuan, and Nie Huaisang nodded rapidly in agreement (the last making sure to send a heavy look his brother's way, silently requesting some trinkets of his own).

(Nie Mingjue pretended he couldn't see.)

But Wei Wuxian merely shrugged, responding, "Asking and buying are two different things. Why should I have to get it for him just because I asked?"

"Don't ask then!" Jiang Cheng shouted from the side. Madam Yu sent him a disapproving look for his lack of control, but, in all honesty, no one here had any face to save around the others anymore.

Unlike Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji appeared lost for words. He simply glared at Wei Wuxian for a moment, not knowing how else to respond. Then, after a while, he glanced down at Wen Yuan.

(The force of his stare caused A-Yuan to start trembling once more.)

"Which one… do you want?"

A-Yuan stared back nervously, not understanding the question. Realizing the issue, Lan Wangji gestured toward the stall.

“Of the things there. Which one do you want?”

“Aw,” Jiang Yanli cooed. Lan Xichen smiled softly, enjoying the scene.

Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, lit up and turned toward Lan Wangji with a rather terrifying look in his eyes. The Lan didn’t know whether that look was over ‘the evidence of Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji being parents’ or ‘the ease at which Nie Huaisang might be able to get Lan Wangji to buy things for him.’

He decided he was better off not knowing.

However, A-Yuan simply shook his head. He clearly wanted the toys and was disappointed to have not gotten them, but he was hesitant to accept a present from Lan Wangji.

Jin Zixuan frowned.

(Had A-Yuan been hurt by adults too many times to trust even Lan Wangji?)

Zixuan couldn’t help but glance at his father once more, disheartening further when he saw that Jin Guangshan didn’t seem to be feeling anything but boredom at the current scene.

“One hour later,” Lan Jingyi announced.

A-Yuan was no longer crying now. Instead, he felt at his pockets, which were now completely stuffed with toys and other playthings Lan Wangji had gifted him. He couldn’t stop touching and observing them, disbelief still clear in his expression.

Wei Wuxian smiled from the sides.

‘Did Wei Wuxian say what he did in the hopes that it would make Wangji get something for A-Yuan?’ Lan Qiren wondered. ‘He might’ve just been looking to mess with the vendor who had been laughing at them and play with A-Yuan a bit, but it’s not impossible.’

Lan Wangji’s eyes were on Wei Wuxian, taking in everything with as analytically as he could. It hadn’t been that long since Wei Wuxian had hunkered down in the Burial Mounds, so he couldn’t have changed too much.

~~A cultivator with a core as powerful as his probably wouldn’t have changed at all.~~

However, his skin had become a little dry and flaky, the malnutrition weakening it a little. His arms were not yet stick-like, but they were certainly closer to that than they had been before. On the other hand, Wei Wuxian was smiling brighter than ever. Every time A-Yuan looked down at his pockets again, the Yiling Patriarch’s smile seemed to widen just a bit more. Although it was barely noticeable, Hanguang-jun began to smile as well.

Suddenly, there was a pressure on Lan Wangji’s leg. He looked down, finding that a now-beaming toddler had wrapped his arms and legs around him.

Wei Wuxian began to laugh:

“Congratulations, Lan Zhan! He’s taken a liking to you. He hugs the legs of people he likes, never letting go!”

“Well, he tries to not let go,” Jiang Cheng muttered, rolling his eyes. “You wouldn’t have lost him if he actually didn’t.”

(And, putting that aside, he couldn’t help but recall another person who had been grabbed. When A-Yuan wrapped around the future Jiang Cheng’s leg, the result had been a little different.)

After a moment of thought, Wei Wuxian patted Lan Wangji on the shoulder twice, declaring, “In my opinion, your night hunting can wait. Why don’t we go get some food?”

“Get some food?” Lan Wangji repeated.

“Yeah; let’s get something to eat. Don’t be so cold! You finally came to Yiling for once and I happened to run into you! Let’s reminisce about the past together. Come, it’s my treat.”

That plan made, Wei Wuxian got to work immediately, physically dragging Lan Wangji along. With Wei Wuxian holding onto his arm and A-Yuan still hanging onto his leg, Hanguang-jun was well and truly trapped.

“Vanquished like never before,” Nie Huaisang declared, nodding solemnly. This time, he made sure to speak too quietly for his brother to hear. However, having come closer to Lan Wangji throughout the scene, he was certain the second jade of Lan had heard what he’d said. And, indeed, Lan Wangji glanced back at him once.

Then looked away, unable to disagree.

(If Nie Huaisang wasn’t mistaken, there was a tiny, fond smile on his lips. He decided to count that as a win; everyone had been far too dour since the last segment.)

By now, Wei Wuxian had managed to drag Lan Wangji into a private room at a restaurant. A-Yuan had leg go of Lan Wangji’s leg at long last and sat to the side. A carved wooden statue was in one of his hands, two paper butterflies in the other. On the table, the pink pinwheels laid, ready to be used at a moment’s notice. He looked perfectly comfortable there, smiling as widely as he could.

Madam Yu felt her stomach turn at the sight.

The simulation had only shown one meal the Jiangs had together, right after the Wens announced they would be requiring heirs to be sent to their camps. It made perfect sense for Madam Yu to be unusually stressed at a time like that, but…

Well, what had occurred then wasn’t necessarily unusual.

‘How can you be so calm and unconcerned?! What do you think they plan to do if we ‘dare’ to disobey their orders? Wen Ruohan is pushing his luck! How arrogant. Either A-Cheng or A-Li must go… we’re literally sending them there just to be hostages!’

‘A-Niang, don’t be mad,’ Jiang Cheng requested as he stood. ‘I’ll go.’

‘Of course you’ll be the one to go! We can’t send your sister, can we?’

Her A-Cheng was the one in danger. He was the one with the most right to be angry. It made perfect sense that Madam Yu was angry on his behalf, but…

In a situation like this, where he was about to become a hostage, why did her son have to spend his meal placating her?

~~As he always did.~~

~~As they all had to, whenever she was home.~~

And then, just a few seconds later…

‘A-Li, stop peeling that!’ Madam Yu snapped, seeing her daughter hand the son of a servant some lotus seeds she had peeled out of the goodness of her heart. Or, rather, handing them to Wei Wuxian — someone she verbally proclaimed to be her brother as soon as Madam Yu was gone.

Wasn’t the situation the Wens were in now a worse one than what the Jiangs were in at that time? However, as Madam Yu looked over the simulation now, she couldn’t see anything but unrestrained joy on A-Yuan’s face.

She sighed, withholding the disapproving huff she wanted to make.

The waiter entered the room, handing them both menus to look over. Hanguang-jun began scanning through his, only to pause and look up when he noticed Wei Wuxian wasn’t doing the same.

“Go ahead: order,” Wei Wuxian offered.

Instead, Lan Wangji set the menu down before countering, “You can order.”

“No, no. I’m treating you, so of course you’ll be the one ordering. Really, order whatever you like. Don’t be so polite.”

They were being quite courteous to each other.

But there was a strange distance there, too.

In the past, when Wei Wuxian was at the Cloud Recesses, he would have finished that sentence with “don’t be such a fuddy-duddy.” After being brought back to life, he would conclude, “Then, Lan Zhan, are you saying I can get whatever I want? Are you sure you’re willing to endure that?" Either way, his response would have been teasing and mischievous, but familiar and close, too.

Things simply couldn't be like that right now.

A feeling of wrongness permeated the watchers once more.

That feeling was only strengthened by the next thought Wei Wuxian had:

'It's a good thing I didn't buy those poisonous sprouted potatoes earlier,' he thought. 'I'll have enough money to treat Lan Zhan to something now.'

The implication being, of course, that he wouldn't have been able to treat Lan Wangji if he had bought them. At that, Jin Zixuan couldn't help but recall his own disbelief at Wei Wuxian's ridiculous charade in front of the toy seller. He had been so confused. Wei Wuxian didn't have to get them for A-Yuan, but there didn't seem to be any reason not to.

(However, if sprouted potatoes were enough to empty his pockets, toys probably weren't even under consideration. Sure, one wouldn't be too expensive, but if that one could have instead been another potato to feed the Wens, then that was the obvious choice to make.)

Jin Zixuan's father had always gotten him everything he needed. Nothing was out of reach for the Jin Sect. If Jin Zixuan wanted a paper pinwheel, he would get it; if he wanted an exotic beast, it was his; if he wanted enough jewels to fill a room, they would arrive by morning. So long as it didn't belong to his father or mother, it was his.

The thought that those simple trinkets might be difficult to get hadn't even crossed Jin Zixuan's mind.

He flushed, ashamed at himself for not realizing sooner.

(To his side, Jiang Yanli reacted in the exact same way.)

Although Lan Wangji was more than willing to let Wei Wuxian order, the other's persistence paid off. Wangji looked over the menu once more before ordering. The items he had selected were all dishes that could make one's mouth burn just from hearing the name. It was, above all else, food that could never be found in Gusu.

Thus, Wei Wuxian commented, "Not bad, Lan Zhan. I thought you folks from Gusu didn't eat spicy things. You have quite the strong palate, don't you?"

A reasonable assumption to make. However…

Earlier, when forced to eat the spicy congee Wei Wuxian had made, the juniors had fallen to the ground, crying out from the magnitude of the spice. Wei Wuxian had been a little befuddled:

'Is it really that bad?' he asked. 'You're all from Gusu, but Hanguang-jun is much better at handling spice than you guys.'

‘Not at all, senior,’ Lan Sizhui corrected. ‘Hanguang-jun never has spicy food.’

Wei Wuxian had been surprised, then, recalling this very moment in Yiling.

‘...Looking back on it, I don’t think Lan Zhan actually picked up his chopsticks.’

The watchers all looked back and forth between the real and simulated Lan Wangji, eyes wide.

“...Not bad,” Nie Mingjue admitted, sending Lan Wangji a nod of respect. Grand, heroic gestures were one thing, but these little, unneeded acts spoke even more strongly of how much he cared.

Jin Zixuan narrowed his eyes, furiously taking mental notes.

As Lan Wangji looked over at his other self, he swallowed nervously. It would take hard work to bring his spice tolerance up to manageable levels, but he was more than willing to put the effort in. Risking death was a small price to pay if it meant he might be able to try Wei Wuxian’s cooking.

“You want a drink?” Wei Wuxian asked, gesturing toward the drinks portion of the menu.

Lan Wangji shook his head.

“Still sticking to the rules even when you’re outside — exactly what I’d expect of Hanguang-jun. I won’t order any for you, then.”

Thirteen years later Wei Wuxian was thrilled when Lan Wangji agreed to drink with him. However, he appeared almost equally amused when Lan Wangji refused. No matter what the second jade did, Wei Wuxian was just happy to be with him.

Jiang Cheng sighed but, this time, acknowledged that thought without any further fuss.

A-Yuan, still holding three toys in his left hand, reached up to tug at Lan Wangji’s robe. Seeing how the toddler prevented Lan Wangji from having even a sip of tea, Wei Wuxian spoke up:

“A-Yuan, come here,” he instructed.

When A-Yuan looked over at Wei Wuxian, a memory formed in his head:

‘There! Now you’ve been planted like all the other radishes!’ Wei Wuxian declared. ‘If we water you well, you’ll grow up big and strong!’

Below him, A-Yuan’s head poked out of the ground, his body buried deep in the dirt.

A-Yuan glanced at Lan Wangji, then back at Wei Wuxian. Then toward Lan Wangji, then back at Wei Wuxian. Toward the toy-giver, then back at the radish-burrier.

His face shifted into a firm, 'NO!'

(An illusion of those characters popped up behind him.)

Jiang Yanli began to laugh and Lan Qiren, watching that interaction, couldn't help but relax as well. His gaze turned soft.

'What I wanted, really, was for Wangji and Xichen to grow up into people who could be happier than their father,' he thought, growing nostalgic. 'I'm sure nothing official will happen until the thirteen-years later segment, but… if Wangji manages to make a family like this, even if that family is with the Yiling Patriarch, I can't really complain.'

However, with that thought, came a second, far more terrifying one.

'Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground.'

What, exactly had happened to A-Yuan, then?

The simulation didn't see it fit to answer that quite yet. Wei Wuxian's expression turned amused at A-Yuan's refusal, but he gestured to the spot beside himself again.

"You'll be in the way if you sit there," he explained. "Come here."

However, Lan Wangji allowed it with a simple, "It's fine. Let him sit."

Overcome with joy, A-Yuan draped himself over Lan Wangji's leg.

'Between the two of them, I didn't expect Wangji to be the doting parent,' Lan Xichen thought.

Wei Wuxian spun his chopsticks in his hand, laughing, "The one with the milk is the mother, but the one with the gold is the father — how unreasonable! You know-"

Wei Wuxian cut off as the doors slid open. Their dishes had arrived.

Lan Qiren had to fight to keep himself from recoiling at the sight of the burning red plates.

It was truly a sea of fire. Such a table would make a bystander break out in sweat just from the smell. However, Wei Wuxian's face merely lit up in glee. He immediately reached forward, sampling everything he could.

Several watchers cringed from just imagining the taste.

Luckily, A-Yuan's meal was spared the same fate. Lan Wangji had ordered a bowl of sweet soup for him instead. The thoughtful, considering act made Wei Wuxian smile warmly.

Considering a child's tastes when ordering for them was, in all honesty, the bare minimum. Lan Qiren had no idea why this simple fact made him feel so relieved.

‘Well, perhaps you can blame your brother for that,’ something in the back of his mind whispered spitefully. Although he frowned at the thought, Lan Qiren couldn’t counter it either.

(How long had it been since Qingheng-zun had last seen his children, much less had a meal with them? And to think, at the beginning of the simulation, Lan Qiren had feared that things would turn out even worse for Wangji than they had for the boy’s father.)

“A-Yuan, it’s time to eat,” Wei Wuxian said, knocking twice on the child’s bowl. However, the toddler wasn’t listening at all. Instead, he was completely captivated by the pair of butterfly toys Lan Wangji had given him.

A play was put on before their eyes.

The butterfly in A-Yuan’s left hand moved up and then, flitting back and forth nervously, tilted forward.

“I… I like you,” A-Yuan said.

The other butterfly immediately moved up, bouncing up and down with visible excitement and joy.

“I really like you too!” A-Yuan concluded.

Nie Huaisang sniffled, having to hold back tears at the beautiful performance.

Wen Ruohan, meanwhile, became even more quiet than before. Towards the beginning of the simulation, such a scene would have felt like a waste of time. In fact, even now, he wasn’t entirely sure what the point was. There was no value in something like this. No point — no worth.

And yet…

(A-Yuan wasn’t worth much as he was now, but children were nothing but potential. For only one child to have made it out of that camp…)

Wen Ruohan turned away.

And A-Yuan’s gripping performance continued on:

The right butterfly surged forth.

“Let’s leave! We should go to a place with lots of flowers!” it declared.

“Together?”

“Yes! Let’s get married!”

Upon hearing that, Wei Wuxian couldn't help but laugh.

"Good Heavens, A-Yuan, where do you learn such things? You like me, I like you — do you even know what liking someone means?"

At that question, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan couldn't help but glance at each other, both laughing upon realizing the eye contact they'd made. Lan Wangji very sincerely hoped his ears were not bright red.

"Stop playing now. Come eat," Wei Wuxian instructed. "Come on. Your new dad got you this. It's good!"

"New dad?" Lan Xichen repeated. "Oh my, that was faster than I expected."

"Xiongzhang!"

"No need to worry," Wen Qing — of all people! — assured. "Our family will take good care of your brother."

Smiling happily, Lan Xichen said, "I leave him in your capable hands, then."

"Xiongzhang!"

At long last, with the butterflies happily married and away, A-Yuan put the toys back in his pocket. He took a slightly-too-large spoon in his hand and began drinking soup mouthful by mouthful. With every gulp he seemed more excited to drink than ever before. His hand sped up, forcing soup into his mouth at a lightning-fast rate.

Right before a disparaging comment on the boy's manners could come out, Madam Yu forced herself to reign it in. This was not a conference. No one there cared how messily the boy ate. At times like this, it would be best for Madam Yu to not say anything at all.

(And, now that she thought about it, A-Yuan had gone from the Jin's camps to the Burial Mounds; when would he have ever gotten to try something like this simple soup before?)

(That thought made her recall yet another orphan. One who, after being brought in by Jiang Fengmian, had lit up every time he got to try soup made by Jiang Yanli.)

A-Yuan continued eating happily. However, right before he finished the bowl, a thought suddenly occurred to him. He paused, setting the dish down, then pushed it toward Wei Wuxian. Unwillingness was obvious in his expression, but determination still managed to shine through.

"Xian-gege… Xian-gege, eat."

Those words caused a large grin to form on Wei Wuxian's face and he, sticking out his chest proudly, proclaimed, "Yes, very good! So you still know what filial piety means!"

"Speech is forbidden while eating," Lan Wangji pointed out immediately.

“Boo!” Nie Huaisang shouted his way. That, however, only got him a stern look back. The Nie heir turned to his brother, hoping for support, but found Nie Mingjue sending an equally disapproving look his way.

Thoroughly chastised, Nie Huaisang looked down.

A-Yuan, similarly, had begun busying himself with his soup again, not saying a word more. Wei Wuxian gave a betrayed cry:

“How can this be? I have to repeat myself a couple of times to make him listen to me, yet he’ll do what you say after hearing just once! Really, how can this be?”

“Speech is forbidden when dining for you, too,” Lan Wangji scolded again.

Wei Wuxian just laughed at that, swirling the liquor cup in his hand and commenting, “You really… don’t change at all, do you. No matter how many years pass.”

The smile on his face was easy to see.

They weren’t in the Cloud Recesses. Technically, Wei Wuxian didn’t have to follow the ‘no speaking’ rule. Despite that, he took no offense to Lan Wangji’s words. He wanted to eat with Hanguang-jun; hearing Lan Wangji recite rules to him again seemed to bring him nothing but joy.

But…

‘I… I was there too,’ Jiang Cheng thought. ‘I was in Yiling first, before Lan Wangji. I saw A-Yuan then. If we had eaten together, I wouldn’t have stopped them from talking. I wouldn’t make them follow the Lan rules. Why…’

Why wasn’t he there now?

‘I don’t even have to have sided with them. If I just hadn’t said he was an enemy, maybe I could have-’

But his other-self had said that.

Was it any wonder, now, why Wei Wuxian was so determined to avoid him after being brought back to life? Jiang Cheng would probably avoid his other-self too.

“Hey, Lan Zhan, why did you come to Yiling?” Wei Wuxian asked abruptly. “I’m familiar with this area. Want me to show you around?”

Wei Wuxian gave a half-nod, having expected that answer. Cultivation sects often had secret tasks they couldn’t share with others as they pleased. Thus, there was no reason for Wei Wuxian to push.

He gave a small, pleased sigh.

“I finally got to meet someone I knew from before; someone who wouldn’t try to avoid me, too. It’s been so stuffy for the past few days.”

His voice was nostalgic and wistful. Longing and mournful, too.

(Because, for all that Jiang Cheng might’ve accused him of wanting to play the hero, there was nothing easy about what he had to do.)

“Hey, Lan Zhan, can you pass something along? Did anything big happen outside?”

If something had happened, Wei Wuxian wouldn’t have any way to know. Though it was to a lesser extent than before, the Burial Mounds had become his prison once more.

“...What would you count as something big?” Hanguang-jun inquired.

“You know, like if a new sect has sprung up out of nowhere! Has a clan expanded their borders? Any sects forming new alliances with one another? That sort of thing. Just small talk, you know? Anything big happen outside?”

There was a brief pause between them. Lan Wangji furrowed his brows slightly, choosing his next words carefully.

“...An arranged marriage,” he admitted at last.

“Really? For which sects?”

“The Yunmeng Jiang Clan and the Lanling Jin Clan.”

Wei Wuxian froze. As the liquor cup he’d been spinning in his hands came to an abrupt halt, some liquid splashing over the side.

Jiang Yanli’s eyes widened.

“Huh?” she asked.

For a moment, no one could speak.

That was happy news. Jiang Yanli had been looking forward to that since the day she had met her fiance. They already knew from the simulation that it was going to happen, but it was still a good thing. However-

“Wait. Wait…” she trailed off, glancing back at her brother, her mother, then over to her fiance. “If… if he reacted like that, then A-Xian… didn’t know?”

No response came. That was almost worse than confirmation.

“But…. that’s not-”

She looked back at her shidi once more.

Wei Wuxian's eyes were wide, but the mixture of emotions within was almost impossible to read. There was no one word that could encapsulate it well, because-

"A-Xian… is learning about my marriage… from Hanguang-jun?"

Just by itself, that sentence made no sense. It couldn't be true — not for him. A-Xian, who, at ten, had created pages upon pages of detailed notes to help plan her wedding? Her Wei Wuxian, who had stayed up late into the night telling her about how glorious it would be? Wei Ying, who had promised to be with her every step of the way?

She hadn't even gotten to tell him?

And now:

"I see…." Wei Wuxian set his cup down at last. "My Shi — ah, Maiden Jiang will be marrying Jin Zixuan?"

"Maiden Jiang?!" Jiang Yanli repeated, her voice breaking as she did.

Jiang Cheng had to look away.

"When will it be? When's the ceremony?"

"In seven days," Lan Wangji said.

Wei Wuxian nodded once, slowly, processing the information.

Jiang Yanli didn't look like she could even manage that.

"It… it won't happen with us, A-Li," Jin Zixuan promised. "We won't let it happen here-"

"But it still happened there!" she cried out, swerving toward him. "It's still… it's another world. That world isn't going to change. That A-Xian, he-"

She cut herself off once more.

And Madam Yu, watching, suddenly became very aware that this was everything she had wanted to see. Her A-Li was marrying Jin Zixuan; Wei Wuxian was no threat to Jiang Cheng — wasn't even part of the sect, much less the family.

And yet, watching this now, all she could feel was that this was completely and utterly wrong.

Wei Wuxian nodded once more, still not really having a reaction. Hands shaking, he lifted his cup again to take another sip. However, once it reached his lips, he realized that the last of the liquor had spilled out when he set the cup down. It was empty, now.

Slowly, he set it on the table once more.

Helplessness burned at Lan Wangji's soul. It was a familiar feeling but, this time, it was of a slightly different variety than before. When Wei Wuxian was thrown into the Burial Mounds, there had been nothing Lan Wangji could do. He couldn't interfere with the simulation and his other self was nowhere nearby. This time, his other-self was sitting right across from Wei Wuxian. However…

What, exactly, would fix this?

'Well… I'd been expecting that to happen even before I left,' Wei Wuxian supposed. With those words, a flashback formed. A forest, lush and overgrown in a way the Burial Mounds could never be, appeared around them. In the distance, a few bushes rustled.

Pop.

Pop.

Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian's heads poked out of them.

Then, closer to the watchers, a man in yellow stood.

"No! The man who was rude to Maiden Jiang can't have been me!" Jin Zixuan cried out. When he looked down, the object before him came into view: a pot with an unbloomed lotus flower inside.

Jiang Yanli's eyes widened a little. Jin Zixuan flushed bright red.

'I was going to try growing one for her when we got out! Why is it revealing my plan before I even got to try?!'

But, ignorant of the real Jin Zixuan's woes, the simulated Jin Zixuan muttered, "If… if I take good care of this precious violet lotus, then, when I give it to Jiang-guniang…"

An image formed before him. The lotus had bloomed fully, its petals spreading out proudly. Jiang Yanli appeared in front of it. As she looked down at the gift, her eyes sparkled.

"Wow, what a beautiful violet lotus," she said softly, her voice as gentle as a warm summer breeze. "You're amazing, Jin-gongzi."

Jin Zixuan laughed openly as she came close.

Then that image vanished, leaving only the rosy-cheeked, daydreaming Jin Zixuan in its place.

Jiang Cheng coughed to hide his scoff.

"A-Cheng, don't be rude," Jiang Yanli said, her words barely loud enough to be heard.

(It was important to be able to focus on the simulation. These scenes would most certainly have interested her at any other time. However, right now, it was hard to care.)

In any case, the simulated Jin Zixuan was full of optimism. He immediately set to work, picking up some fertilizer and dumping it into the pot. Thanks to the spiritual nature of the plant, that was enough to make its petals immediately creep open. It was only a tiny movement, but an enormous smile formed on Jin Zixuan's face. He could barely contain his excitement, scooping several more piles in.

"Add more. Add more," he told himself. "Quickly. Quickly, bloom."

Plop.

Plop.

Plop.

Plop.

Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng, still hiding in the bushes, made eye contact with each other.

"...Are you supposed to add that much?" Nie Mingjue asked at last. The other watchers paused, looked at the simulated Jin Zixuan, then looked towards each other to see what everyone else thought. They were some of the most educated people in the world.

Unfortunately, their knowledge on gardening left much to be desired.

The simulated Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng were similarly ignorant, their expressions getting more confused the longer they watched.

"What is he doing?" Jiang Cheng whispered.

"I don't know. But, if he upsets Shijie again, I'll definitely punish him," Wei Wuxian declared.

Jiang Yanli's expression wavered. The meaning of what he was saying barely registered in her mind. There was only one word she could focus on.

"A-Xian," she muttered softly.

Just as she called him that, Wei Wuxian had always called her "Shijie." As he should. There was no reason for him not to.

There shouldn't be any reason for him not to.

(The simulation had shown them horrible things before, but Wei Wuxian trying to not call her "Shijie" felt wrong in a very different way than the Burial Mounds had. This political, social, internal change was better in some ways, and far, far worse in others.)

(He had heard about her marriage from Lan Wangji.)

The simulation darkened then brightened once more, revealing the sparkling lotus lakes of Yunmeng. The flowers here were all, noticeably, still buds. Dragonflies came to rest on their leaves instead of the small, wound-up petals, too heavy for the buds to support them.

Overlooking this sight, Jiang Yanli stood in wait.

"Jiang-guniang!" Jin Zixuan called out from the side. She turned toward him, a bit of surprise on her face.

"I… um," Jin Zixuan paused, shut his eyes, then bravely held out the pot with a rushed, "T-take this!"

(Simultaneously, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Wanyin's heads popped out of the lake below.)

Jin Zixuan sighed again, wishing, once more, that the simulation wasn't so dead-set on embarrassing him all the time.

(On the other hand, this was — slightly — preferable to watching even more go wrong for Wei Wuxian. He supposed he should take his small victories where he could.)

The simulated Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng glared his way. Keeping half their faces below water, they observed Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan's interactions with narrowed eyes.

Jin Zixuan began:

"W-well." He cleared his throat. "To me, in my mind, you're just like… just like… um…"

He turned away momentarily, pulling out a slip of paper from his sleeve. Meanwhile, a dark aura began to rise from the plant.

The watchers, now sensitive to this, were easily able to recognize that as resentful energy.

"Oh no," Jin Zixuan muttered.

His simulated self turned around, smiling wide as he said, "Your aura is as beautiful as this lotus is!"

The second he finished talking, the lotus appeared to wilt on the spot. It turned an ashy gray, crumpling in on itself into a pile of rot.

"Excellent work, Young Master Jin."

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue shouted. "Can't you hold these sorts of comments in until later?!"

But his brother was undeterred, merely turning to Jin Zixuan to say, "Pay more attention to what Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong do. At the very least, I doubt it can make you worse!"

There was nothing Jin Zixuan could say in response.

Especially not when, flailing widely, his simulated self said, "Wait, Jiang-guniang, I-I can explain! I didn't mean anything like this! I just… it's just this lotus is-"

Suddenly, two projectiles burst out of the water from behind. It was the Yiling Patriarch and Sect Leader Jiang. The fact that their clothes were drenched all the way through didn't slow them down in the least.

"Aaaah!"

Jin Zixuan was sent flying.

"Stay away from my Shjie!" Wei Wuxian shouted after him.

Consolingly, Jiang Yanli patted Jin Zixuan twice on the head. She might not be able to actually touch him, but doing that still felt appropriate. Jin Zixuan buried his face in his hands, unable to watch for even a moment longer.

The simulated Jin Zixuan surfaced at last, facing Wei Wuxian's enraged shouts head on. He sighed in frustration, lowering himself just slightly so that his mouth was underwater. The pathetic stream of bubbles that formed perfectly encapsulated his feelings on his attempt.

'I can't give up so easily,' he thought.

As Jin Guangshan watched, he couldn't help but think that he really should have pushed Jin Zixuan harder in the boy's youth. If he had convinced Jin Zixuan to come with him and Jin Zixun to a brothel, the boy probably wouldn't be struggling so much now.

Well, he could always fix that mistake once the simulation was over.

There was a change of scenery. A rustle in the bushes. Jin Zixuan popped out right in front of Jiang Yanli, holding a wooden sculpture out to her.

"Jiang-guniang, I carved this myself. Please accept it," he requested. "It represents the strength of my feelings for you."

The wooden carving — a fake model of the Jiang sect's bell — snapped in two a moment after.

Jin Zixuan flinched back as if he'd been stabbed.

"Jiang-guniang. Please, accept this!" Jin Zixuan said, holding out a finely decorated hairpin. "It-it demonstrates my eternal loyalty to-"

Attracted by the glittering gold, a bird swooped down and snatched the pin away. Having shut his eyes in nervousness, the simulated Jin Zixuan didn't notice until it was too late.

This time, the embarrassment seemed to have stabbed Jin Zixuan in the back. He collapsed onto his hand and knees.

Within the main hall of Yunmeng, Jin Zixuan approached her with a steaming bowl of soup. Jiang Yanli looked down at it, which Jin Zixuan took as his cue:

"Jiang-guniang, I made lotus and pork rib soup for you. Have a taste!" he requested, beaming.

Her smile turned somewhat awkward, concern rising within her.

"Ah, don't worry. It's not poisoned or anything," he promised. "Here: I'll drink it to show you."

And thus, he did.

He collapsed on the floor a moment later.

Jin Zixuan didn't even have to look to know that the loud thump he heard couldn't be good.

They were brought out to the lakes once more. Enough time had passed by now that the buds were about half bloomed. Apparently, he had been at this for a while.

"I'm not sure whether to admire your tenacity or fear your terrible luck," Nie Huaisang said.

"Both," Jiang Cheng declared.

"At this point, I'm half-tempted to believe he's been cursed," Nie Mingjue added on.

Lan Xichen laughed a little, commenting, "That sounds like exactly the kind of thing the townspeople would suspect the Yiling Patriarch of."

And, this time, he actually had a motive.

Jin Zixuan just wilted further.

Madam Jin, watching this, couldn't help but smile. It was almost the exact opposite of the many, many interactions Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan had shared in their youth. She was always chasing after him, unable to get even a second glance.

'How does it feel now, Zixuan?' she thought, smugly. 'If you had listened to me and given Jiang-guniang a chance, you wouldn't be in this situation at all right now.'

(Of course, if Madam Jin hadn't pushed it and had just let Jin Zixuan meet Jiang Yanli normally, there might have been no problems at all. That was beside the point, however, so she decided to not pay much attention to it.)

The simulation moved back inside, bringing them to the same medical facility Wei Wuxian had woken up in after his run-in with the Xuanwu of Slaughter. This time, however, the patient lying there was Jin Zixuan.

He blinked his eyes open.

Upon finding himself looking up at the ceiling, an understanding of what just happened came over him.

"Oh, I'm done for!" he cried out, burying his face in his hands. "That couldn't have gone worse. Jiang-guniang hates me even more now!"

A light laugh came from the side, resounding like the tinkling of bells.

"Oh no," Jin Zixuan muttered, still not looking up. "Oh no, no, no, no."

There was no way for him to have not recognized that voice.

Lan Wangji sent him a carefully disguised look of pity from the side.

"Miss Jiang," Jin Zixuan said, sitting up. His cheeks had flushed bright pink once more, but Jiang Yanli just smiled at the sight. Reaching forward, she cupped Jin Zixuan's cheek. As an additional token from the spirits, pink hearts began to materialize around the pair, giving off a soft glow.

"Young love," Madam Jin muttered.

(Had she ever felt something so pure?)

The watchers' view was pulled back to where Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng gazed in from outside. The Yiling Patriarch gave a short 'humph' and Jiang Cheng glared, but neither intervened.

As Jiang Cheng's other self had said, there was nothing they could do. Jiang Yanli liked him, after all.

'Well,' Jiang Cheng thought, glancing at the real versions of his sister and her fiance, 'I guess… there are worse people she could have picked.'

That scene faded away, returning them to the room where Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian were eating together. The carefully-blank smile Wei Wuxian wore was just as heavy as it had been before.

Jiang Yanli tensed slightly, feeling her good mood vanish at once.

(Wei Wuxian had been right there, defending her all the way. How could someone who had watched all those things happen have heard about the marriage a week before it occurred — and from Lan Wangji? No matter how many times she repeated that question in her head, denial was all she could feel.)

At this moment, Jiang Yanli felt her own powerlessness more than ever before. It was one thing to not be able to help in a life or death battle; this was something else entirely.

And now…

‘Jiang Cheng… didn’t tell me,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘If I hadn’t met Lan Zhan today, how much longer would it have taken me to find out?’

Jiang Cheng tensed.

(He had been trying to not think about the same thing.)

You could make all the excuses you wanted — the sects were watching the Jiang too carefully, so maybe it was dangerous; Wei Wuxian was busy taking care of the Wens, so perhaps foreknowledge of Jiang Yanli’s wedding would have made it difficult for him to stay — but that probably wasn’t the real reason. The simulation had been rather clear on the future Jiang Cheng’s feelings, after all:

‘When he heard the former Sect Leader Nie mention what had happened to his sect again, hatred sprouted within him. This hatred was directed not only at everyone seated in that room, but also at Wei Wuxian.’

Jiang Cheng had tried to convince him to return home. Instead of agreeing, Wei Wuxian had ~~abandoned them~~ refused. Jiang Cheng, in response, had declared him an enemy of all cultivation sects. Was the political situation they were in a factor? Certainly.

(But, even if it wasn’t, the bitterness his other self felt would probably be more than enough reason to keep this from Wei Wuxian.)

Too quietly to be heard, Jiang Cheng gave a hollow laugh.

“Two Prides of Yunmeng, huh?” he muttered.

Still processing, Wei Wuxian closed his eyes. He breathed in, letting some serenity wash over him.

‘Let’s be honest. Even if Jiang Cheng had told me, nothing would be different. He’s already announced that I defected from Yunmeng. I’m not supposed to be affiliated with them anymore. Even if I had been told about it, I wouldn’t be able to attend the wedding banquet. Really, it was right for Jiang Cheng to not tell me. If he was the one I heard this from, I don’t know what I would’ve done.’

“Huh? What’s that supposed to mean?” Jiang Cheng asked. “I… what would have been wrong about hearing of it from me?”

“Nothing, obviously,” Madam Yu scoffed. “He’s just…”

She trailed off, not having an answer either.

“He’s trying to look on the positive side of things,” Lan Xichen pointed out. “He’s always been good at that.”

‘A-Xian, you were born with a smiling face,’ Jiang Yanli had said. ‘Always smiling, never minding sorrowful things. No matter what situation you’re in, you can always be happy.’

Which was an amazing thing. It spoke to the strength of Wei Wuxian's character. When Jiang Yanli said that, there were only good intentions behind her words.

'It's that temperament of yours that allows you to stand A-Cheng's bad temper.'

But the things happening to him now weren't fine just because he could take it. Lan Wangji, watching with an unreadable expression on his face, stood up. He walked forward, only stopping when he was by Wei Wuxian's side. The simulation was made of the spirit's memories; Wei Wuxian wouldn't be able to feel him.

Still, it felt right.

Meanwhile, standing farther back, Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes.

'Wei Ying said that it would be difficult given that Jiang Wanyin had announced he'd 'defected from Yunmeng.' Is he just trying to not focus on the additional things the Jiang brat said? Does he not want to consider his status as an enemy of the sects?'

Or, locked away in the Burial Mounds and cut off from most communication, did he just not know?

It was hard to say. Wei Wuxian's expression seemed to reveal nothing about what he thought. Unusually quiet, he picked up the bottle and refilled his cup. His hand shook just a little.

"...Either way, Jin Zixuan was let off way too easily," Wei Wuxian declared. "Lan Zhan, what do you think about this marriage?"

For a while, Lan Wangji didn't respond.

"Ah, that's right. No point in asking you. What thoughts could you have on the marriage anyway? It's not like you ever think about these things."

Wei Wuxian liked and respected Lan Wangji. Everything he had done so far made that more than clear. However, Hanguang-jun was not the person he wanted to hear about Jiang Yanli's marriage from.

Wei Wuxian emptied his cup in one gulp, continuing, "I know that, behind closed doors, everyone will be saying that my Shijie doesn't deserve Jin Zixuan. Ha! In my eyes, though, Jin Zixuan is the one who doesn't deserve my Shijie! It's just that she had to, um… ah."

(She had to go and fall in love with Jin Zixuan.)

Jin Zixuan clenched his fists together, steeling his resolve once more. He would win over Wei Wuxian if it was the last thing he did!

(He had to. Even the simple fact of Wei Wuxian being too heated to remember to call her 'Maiden Jiang' had made Jiang Yanil's eyes water momentarily.)

Cheeks flushed with alcohol, Wei Wuxian slammed his cup onto the table and declared, "Lan Zhan! Do you know? My Shijie deserves the best person in the world! Her wedding's going to be a grand banquet! One everyone admires and praises, even after a hundred years! Nothing will be able to compare to it!"

As he spoke, an image appeared. A young Wei Wuxian, twelve at most, sitting with Jiang Cheng. Papers laid strewn out between them, depicting their plans for the marriage.

A memory from better times.

"I'll watch my Shijie get married in absolute splendor," Wei Wuxian said.

"Mn."

And, at that, Wei Wuxian couldn't help but laugh.

"Ah, Lan Zhan, why did you answer?" he asked, his drunken expression gaining a bitter edge. "I… won't be able to watch it anymore."

Jiang Yanli was certain getting stabbed through the gut would have hurt less than this.

"I-" she cut off. "A-Xian, I…"

No other words came.

Jiang Cheng could remember those nights as well — the planning he and Wei Wuxian had done, huddled in bed under the moonlight; their shared promise to defend Jiang Yanli if Jin Zixuan tried anything even remotely funny. Those were the naive dreams of children, but…

'Was it worth it?' Jiang Cheng wondered. 'Future me, what about this — about any of this — seems worth it to you? What did you gain from declaring him an enemy of the sects? Why did you have to say that? Why couldn't you have stopped for once in your life and thought before you said anything?!'

For maybe the first time in his life, Jiang Cheng felt like he truly understood what his father had been trying to say.

A-Yuan, having finished his soup, began playing with the butterfly toys once more. Unfortunately, the long antennas of the two butterflies had gotten tangled up mid-kiss. No matter how many ways A-Yuan tried to pull them apart, they wouldn't budge. Seeing this, Lan Wangji reached over, taking the butterflies from A-Yuan and untangling them with ease. He returned them to A-Yuan.

It was this simple, quiet interaction that seemed to break Wei Wuxian out of his thoughts at last.

"A-Yuan, stop rubbing your face," he scolded, managing a smile. "There's still soup in your mouth. It will dirty your clothes."

Lan Wangji reached forward once more, this time using a white handkerchief to wipe the soup off A-Yuan's mouth.

"Lan Zhan, what a surprise. I never expected you to be so good with children. If you keep treating him like this, he might not be willing to come back with me!"

The smile on his face certainly looked genuine. In isolation, this would have been a purely lighthearted scene.

"What do you think, A-Yuan? Is Hanguang-jun plotting to lure you back with him?" Wei Wuxian poked Wen Yuan a few times, making the boy giggle with glee. "Oh dear. And if he does manage to tempt you into going with him, there'll be nothing I can do! I'll just have to go back to Auntie Qing by myself and face her wrath. You wouldn't make me go do that, would you A-Yuan? You-"

He cut off suddenly, reaching into his sleeve to pull a talisman out. It was already burning, the blue flame not catching anything else on fire but turning the talisman into a pile of ashes nonetheless.

Both Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan perked up, intrigued by the sight of yet another invention from Wei Wuxian. The Yiling Patriarch, on the other hand, appeared far more concerned.

"Oh no," Wei Wuxian muttered, standing up. "Excuse me, Lan Zhan. I have to go back!"

He picked A-Yuan up and ran out of the inn. He was physically fit enough to run amazingly fast, but that was nothing in comparison to the speed he would have if he had ridden on his sword.

Wen Qing clenched her hands into fists.

(She couldn't help but wonder if her other self would have done the operation if she had known what Jiang Cheng would eventually do to them. It was a petty, pointless thought, but one she couldn't help but consider.)

Someone cleared their throat.

"The talisman was the core of a warning array Senior Wei had set up on the Burial Mounds," Ouyang Zizhen explained. "If something happened on the Mounds after he left, like the array being broken or blood being shed, it would burn up at once."

Which explained his frantic rush over.

It did not, however, explain why he was going on foot.

A white flash appeared and Lan Wangji fell into step beside Wei Wuxian, asking, "Why do you not mount your sword?"

"I forgot to bring it!"

Jiang Cheng groaned, nervousness about the general situation boiling over into frustration.

Wen Qing looked over at him and then, pursing her lips together, forced herself to look away once more.

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were running as fast as they could, but the look on Wei Wuxian's face showed how quickly they were running out of time. Without saying anything, Lan Wangji wrapped his arm around Wei Wuxian's waist, sending them both into the air atop Bichen. The people in the streets looked up in shock at the sight. A-Yuan, meanwhile, began to cheer loudly.

"Thank you!" Wei Wuxian said.

Lan Wangji nodded once, rushing on. Soon, the Burial Mounds came into view. The black peaks towered high into the sky, the roars of countless fierce corpses echoing through the forest. The resentful energy felt nearly as thick as the first time they saw the Burial Mounds, lacking the soothing lull Wei Wuxian had brought it into since then.

Lan Qiren slowly sat down again, feeling nauseous at the sensation. Jiang Yanli stumbled a little, collapsing to her knees, and Nie Huaisang huddled closer to his brother. Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen tensed.

'What could have caused the talisman to go off?' Nie Mingjue wondered. Countless scenarios filled his mind, each more horrifying than the last. At the very top of that list was the thing he most feared this would be: his other self, getting access to the Wens while Wei Wuxian was away. It didn't seem very likely. If that had occurred, it probably would've been mentioned in the future. However…

There was a chance, and that terrified him more than words could describe.

Bichen descended, allowing the passengers to get off. As soon as their feet touched solid ground, something flew toward them. Lan Wangji batted it away with Bichen, making the mass of resentful energy fall to the ground.

Then, in the distance, there was a scream:

"A-Ning!"

Wen Qing stood before she even registered what she was doing, her heart pounding in her chest.

In the middle of the forest, around a dozen Wen cultivators stood before Wen Ning. The corpse's unseeing white eyes were revealed as talismans flaked off him one by one. Two other fierce corpses rested in his hands, already torn to shreds. Blackish blood dripped off of them as Wen Ning pounded them into the ground over and over again. He then threw one, sending it crashing through trees at a high speed.

The person closest to Wen Ning was Wen Qing. She held a sword in one hand. With her other hand, she reached into her sleeve and pulled out a new talisman. As Wen Ning moved his arm up and down, repeatedly slamming the corpse he was holding on the ground, she approached. Right when he seemed distracted, she jumped forward and tried to place the talisman on him. However, before she made contact, he swung back, shattering her sword and blasting the talisman away. Wen Qing stumbled at the force. She was knocked off balance; she couldn't dodge. Thus-

"Qing-guniang!" Jiang Yanli gasped, barely able to breathe under the resentment. Too scared to look, she shut her eyes.

The instant before Wen Qing was crushed, a blast of resentful energy knocked Wen Ning away. Glowing red talismans flew in a line, wrapping around 'the Ghost General' like a serpent and sealing his arms to his sides. The corpse grunted and groaned, but could not move.

Quite a few watchers breathed out sighs of relief at that. They couldn't wait for Wen Ning's consciousness to come back.

Wen Ning's struggling continued on.

"Didn't I say to never touch the talismans on him?" Wei Wuxian demanded as he got close.

"Nobody touched them! No one even went into the cave! He tore them off on his own and suddenly went into a rampage. He destroyed the seals at the blood pool and cave as well. All the fierce corpses in the blood pool got out! Wei Wuxian, go help Granny and the others! They won't be able to hold on for much longer!"

Before Wei Wuxian could do that, however, hissing noises came from above. Wei Wuxian looked up, finding a pair of fierce corpses in the trees.

"Wen Ruohan!" Nie Mingjue spoke up at once. "Of the Wens there, how many can fight?!"

Wen Ruohan glanced back briefly, observing Nie Mingjue for a mere moment before responding, "Wen Qing, Wen Ruling, and Wen MoRang can. However, from what I saw, Wen MoRang has lost his leg and Wen Ruling's missing a few fingers. I don't know how well they'll be able to fight."

(And, putting that aside, both were now so old that any training they had gotten in their youth was almost worthless.)

Nie Mingjue gritted his teeth together, turning back to the simulation with hands clenched tightly enough to snap a sword in two.

At that moment, Wen Ning noticed the corpses in the trees. Wei Wuxian had been trying to deal with them in a way that wouldn't aggravate Wen Ning so he hadn't managed to subdue them yet. The Ghost General roared, breaking free of his restraints and shooting up. He grabbed onto the corpses before anyone could react.

Wei Wuxian pulled out Chenqing, calling out, "Lan-"

He cut off, realizing there was no need. He had wanted to ask Lan Wangji for help, but Hanguang-jun was already at work. His zither was pulled out. The strings vibrated under his hands.

All corpses in the area flew back at once.

And Wei Wuxian breathed out a sigh of relief in turn.

The real Lan Wangji did the same, though in a nearly-unnoticeable manner. The fact that his other-self had managed to be there was almost a complete coincidence, which made it especially lucky that it happened to be during such a necessary time.

Hopefully, when the simulation was over, he would be able to provide help just the same.

Then a single, sharp note rang out.

The watchers jumped a little, feeling it call their attention.

The Ghost General, having just landed on the ground, paused and looked toward the source of the sound.

“Wen Ning! Do you remember me?” Wei Wuxian asked.

To the side, three guqin notes rang out:

With that, the corpses were subdued.

Without even thinking about it, the real Lan Wangji mimed playing those same notes, trying to see clearly what his other-self had done to make them so effective.

Wen Ning lowered his body, a deep growl coming out of his throat. Wei Wuxian raised his flute again, however, at the last moment, realized Wen Yuan was hanging onto his leg. He immediately abandoned the notes he was about to play, picking the boy up and throwing him to Wen Qing.

“Take him-!”

Before he could even finish his request, Wen Ning crashed into him like a tidal wave. Wei Wuxian was sent flying back, causing him to crash into a rocky cliff edge. The wind was knocked out of him. He coughed out blood a moment later.

Wen Ruohan’s frown deepened.

It didn't matter how groundbreaking or miraculous Wei Wuxian's inventions were. Cut off from cultivation society, he would have to do each part of the discovery process by himself. When things went wrong, he would have to deal with it alone. If not for Lan Wangji's presence there that day…

How many more revolutionary discoveries would Wei Wuxian have made if he had gotten the support his mind deserved?

(And how much of a role had Wen Ruohan played in sending him there now?)

Lan Wangji looked back at the sound and, upon seeing the state Wei Wuxian was in, rushed toward him at once. Wen Qing had passed A-Yuan to someone else, quickly running to him as well. Lan Wangji got there first, all-but embracing Wei Wuxian as he sent over spiritual energy through their linked hands.

Lan Xichen couldn't help but smile slightly at the sight.

However, Wen Qing vastly different reaction to the matter:

"Let him go. It's not necessary! Let me do it! I'm Wen Qing!"

And Wen Qing was indeed one of the top medics in the world.

Nonetheless, this request of hers did cause several people to look at her strangely. As far as they could tell, there weren't any problems with the treatment Lan Wangji gave.

It didn't matter; Wei Wuxian's focus laid elsewhere.

"Don't let him go!"

Wen Ning didn't appear interested in finishing Wei Wuxian off. Rather, arms hanging low, the corpse was now stumbling toward the bottom of the mountain. There, the rest of the Wens were hiding from fierce corpses.

"Everyone, run! Run! He's going toward you!" Wen Qing shouted, unwilling to leave Wei Wuxian behind. Wei Wuxian was far less concerned about his injuries however, shoving Lan Wangji aside and running after Wen Ning himself. Lan Wangji followed.

"Where's your sword?" Hanguang-jun asked.

Wei Wuxian whipped out twelve talismans, shouting back, "I don't know where I put it!"

"You don't know?!" Madam Yu repeated, her son giving a frustrated groan as their shared concerns piled up. "Ugh. Wei Wuxian, you're not Nie Huaisang! Of all the thoughtless, irresponsible, careless-"

"Shut your mouth," Wen Qing hissed back, not even bothering to look away from the simulation. Although Madam Yu was rather affronted by the command — turning to gape at the doctor, astounded by her audacity — she then simply gritted her teeth together. Arguing felt like a lost cause.

(Especially since, as far as she could tell, most situations were improved when she kept quiet for just a bit longer.)

The twelve talismans Wei Wuxian threw burst into flame, lining up into something resembling a chain of fire to hold Wen Ning down. With a flick of his wrist, Lan Wangji strummed his zither.

Like a tremendous pressure had fallen on top of him, Wen Ning crashed into the ground. However, it wasn't long before he began to struggle forward again, moving toward the Wens once more.

Ignoring the wound to his chest and the blood trickling out of his mouth, Wei Wuxian held up Chenqing and began to play:

Despite the condition he was in, the notes were flawless.

An ocean of calm settled over the watchers at once. It was a wave of serenity mixed with an artificial exhaustion.

'Isn't it hard to do things? Wouldn't doing nothing be far more nice? Come on, just lay down for a bit.'

Nie Huaisang all-but collapsed, slouching against his chair and looking a few seconds away from taking a nap.

And, combined with the attack from Lan Wangji's zither, the musical force was enough to make Wen Ning kneel. However, at that moment, Wei Wuxian coughed. His own blood was choking him, forcing him to stop.

Which shouldn't have ever happened. Inventions like this — miracles like this — should not be left to a two-person team in the middle of the Burial Mounds. There should have been a sect full of cultivators around to help. There should have been trained personnel on-call in case anything went wrong. Anything except this.

Wen Ruohan sighed, rubbing his temples tiredly.

Seeing the state Wei Wuxian was in, Lan Wangji had begun to imbue even more power into his zither. The tremendous force crashing down on Wen Ning was certainly felt, but didn't stop him — not completely. The conflict continued on, reshaping the ground around Wen Ning into a crater as more and more of the Burial Mounds cracked under the force. The corpse's ferocious growls became louder and louder with every attack it felt.

Then:

"Young… Master…"

"A-Ning?" Wen Qing asked. She rushed over, standing directly in front of the illusion of her brother.

And Wei Wuxian reacted as well:

"Lan Zhan, stop for a moment," he requested.

Lan Wangji set a hand against the strings, stopping their vibrations.

Slow and tentative, Wei Wuxian stepped closer and asked, "Wen Ning?"

Wen Ning struggled to lift up his head. Where there had been nothing but white before, there were now a pair of black pupils. Those pupils widened as Wen Ning made eye contact with Wei Wuxian.

"...Young… Master Wei?"

The words were said slowly and clunkily, but were recognizable nonetheless.

"He's back!" Nie Huaisang cheered, finally shaking off the state Wei Wuxian had put him in. Many of the other juniors also grinned widely, pleased to see him again.

But none of them could compare to Wen Qing.

"A-Ning!" she shouted, throwing herself at him. He stumbled slightly at the sudden contact, falling back from the force. However, he didn't attack. Instead:

"Sis… ter?"

'Able to recognize more than just his master,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'I suppose his consciousness really was restored.'

Wen Qing was certain of that too. Tears in her eyes, she pulled Wen Ning close.

"It's me! It's me! It's your sister, A-Ning!"

The real Wen Qing swallowed once, too overwhelmed to speak. They knew that Wen Ning's consciousness would be brought back. However, after having to watch her brother as nothing more than a fierce corpse, it had felt a little hard to believe. Some part of her had wondered if something was going to go wrong.

But now, before her eyes, her whole family began to cheer, ecstatic at Wen Ning's return. Her other-self continued sobbing in Wen Ning's arms, the other Wens shouting in joy.

Wei Wuxian walked over, kneeling down by Wen Ning's side to ask, "How do you feel right now, Wen Ning?"

"I… I…" Wen Ning paused, drawing himself back. "I want to cry right now… but I can't. What's-"

Wei Wuxian patted his shoulder twice, his face turning solemn as he responded, "You remember, don't you? You're already dead."

Wen Qing clenched her fists together, wishing she could deny that fact. For all that Wei Wuxian had brought his consciousness back, Wen Ning's stiff, infrequent movements proved he was no longer alive. No matter how much time passed, his eyes would never blink again.

(That said, words could not describe how much Wei Wuxian had done for them. Wen Qing swore she wouldn't forget it.)

Her other self wouldn't either. With trembling hands, the simulated Wen Qing reached forward and cupped Wen Ning's face. It was surely cool to the touch, lacking any warmth he might have had before. Tears streamed down her cheeks, but the smile on her face was undoubtedly real.

'I should probably give them some time alone,' Wei Wuxian thought, turning away. Wen Ning and Wen Qing's family members were rushing up the hill, cheering loudly. This was for Wen Ning's family. As such, it wouldn't be appropriate for him to stay.

Jiang Yanli frowned just slightly at that. Wei Wuxian was the reason for this happy moment; he shouldn't feel like he was intruding. It was…

Painfully familiar.

'There you go again,' Jiang Fengmian sighed. 'Blaming him for everything.'

'I shouldn't blame him?! If he hadn't fought with Zixuan, none of this would have happened! Ha. Ever since you brought him here you've always favored him. Even over your own son! If it was Jiang Cheng who made a scene would you rush to Gusu like you did? Never!'

Wei Wuxian had listened carefully, hearing every word. And then…

'A-Cheng, be well,' Jiang Fengmian said. 'A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.'

Wei Wuxian hadn't been surprised.

Always the intruder; always the outsider; always the person who didn't belong. Jiang Yanli had tried her best to make Wei Wuxian feel at home. She had meant it when she told Jin Zixun she considered Wei Wuxian to be her real brother. However, as always, there seemed to be so much she couldn't do.

“Lan Zhan,” Wei Wuxian called out. “You’re here anyways. Why not take a seat inside?”

Lan Wangji nodded once.

In the next instant, the two of them were at the top of one of the Burial Mounds’ cliffs, staring at the entrance to a cave. Lan Wangji looked up, reading the sign scrawled at the front.

“The Demon Slaughtering Cave?” he asked.

Wei Wuxian grinned, responding, “That’s right! I came up with the name myself. How is it?”

Lan Wangji remained silent.

“I know, I know,” Wei Wuxian said, giving a thoughtful nod. “In your heart, you’re definitely thinking ‘not very good.’ After the news got out, I heard some people in town talking about it as well, saying that, as someone who cultivates in the demonic path, I’m a demon myself. ‘How could he be so shameless as to call that place the demon-slaughtering cave?’ Or so they said.”

They pair entered the cavern, the light dimming with every step they took.

“But, you see, they have it completely wrong!” Wei Wuxian declared. “The name actually means something completely different! They didn’t understand it at all!”

“...What does it mean?”

Wei Wuxian laughed as though he’d been waiting for Lan Wangji to ask, announcing, “It’s simple: I often sleep like I’m dead inside this cave! A cave that a demon frequently dies in — isn’t that a demon slaughtering cave?!”

Despite the bright smile on Wei Wuxian’s face, those words made Nie Mingjue frown deeply. When Wei Wuxian used the term ‘demon,’ he meant it jokingly and playfully. It was the sort of thing Wei Wuxian might say about himself as a way of getting A-Yuan to chase after him on a mission to slay a demon. It was the kind of thing he might whine to Jiang Yanli about in order to be pampered. It was also, however, a title he couldn’t escape.

(The townsfolk were going to call him that no matter what. If ‘demon’ referred to him regardless of what he did, he might as well use the title himself.)

As Nie Mingjue watched Wei Wuxian laugh about it, he couldn’t help but recall the things people from the far future would say about him every chance they got. To them, ‘Wei Wuxian’ was synonymous with ‘demonic.’ These same ideas had contributed to Jin Ling stabbing him; they weren’t just words, anymore. So what? Wei Wuxian cultivated with resentful energy; therefore he was a demon?

(What would those same people have said if they knew how Nie cultivation worked? Would they turn on him as well? Or would they continue to sing his praises as if he could do no wrong?)

The simulated Lan Wangji appeared similarly concerned, remaining silent for several long moments as Wei Wuxian brought him further inside. The cave was lit faintly, but, other than the dirty surroundings, seemed closer to a lab than a demon's lair. Papers and inventions were strewn about, just like Jiang Cheng had seen when he was last here.

Eventually, Lan Wangji asked, "What about the blood pool?"

"It's right there," Wei Wuxian responded, gesturing to the side. The area he was indicating was a pool of dirty water which, in the dim light of the cave, could switch between looking black or red at any time. The line of talismans meant to form a protective array around it had been broken by Wen Ning. Wei Wuxian walked over and set it up again.

Several watchers breathed out a sigh of relief, feeling the heavy resentment in the air dampen slightly at that.

(For all that Wei Wuxian was making great use of it, the Burial Mounds was not a place anyone should be.)

Lan Wangji fully agreed.

"...The dark energy is dense," he observed, staring at the blood pool with an unreadable gaze.

"It is," Wei Wuxian confirmed. "Fit to nurture dark creatures. I use it to 'raise' fierce corpses that haven't been completed yet. Wanna know how many there are at the bottom? To be honest, I don't know either. The water in the pool has started smelling more and more like blood, though."

Lan Qiren frowned, the long-worn instinct to criticize 'unrighteous practices' pulling at his mind once again. If Wei Wuxian had suggested doing something like this in one of Lan Qiren's classes, he would have gotten a far harsher punishment than the one he'd ended up with. This was-

Well…

It was wrong. It felt wrong and was wrong, but it wasn't unjustifiable in the way Lan Qiren might have viewed it before. After all, as opposed to stopping the production of fierce corpses and allowing the Wen remnants to be taken again, this was vastly preferable.

(And, though far from the biggest contributor, the Lan Sect was one of the groups pushing him into this situation.)

Lan Qiren looked away, the criticisms he'd had washing away under a wave of guilt.

His nephew's concerns were not dissipated so easily:

“Wei Ying.”

“What?”

“Can you really control it?”

“Huh?”

Wei Wuxian glanced back, allowing Lan Wangji to observe him fully. Hanguang-jun’s eyes scanned up and down, taking in everything he could. Wei Wuxian’s pale skin, whether that was due to the lighting or his own lack of blood, stood out starkly against the dark rocks of the cave. His smile was just a little too sharp — a little too wide — to appear normal. For all that his stance was casual, his eyes were alert and wide. It had been him against the world for a while, now.

(The blood he’d been coughing out still stained his robes.)

“What? You mean Wen Ning?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Of course I can control him. Look, his consciousness has already returned. He’s an unprecedented fierce corpse!”

“And what will you do if he loses consciousness again?”

Wei Wuxian grinned, laughing off Lan Wangji’s concerns with a simple, “l was with him like that before. I’m the one who controls him. As long as nothing happens to me, nothing will happen to him either.”

“But what if something does happen to you?!”

“It won’t.”

“How can you be sure?”

“It won’t and it can’t!” Wei Wuxian snapped back.

The watchers stepped back a little, feeling resentment tense defensively around him.

Lan Wangji looked around the dark cave once more, his eyes falling on the Stygian Tiger Seal. It was surrounded by chains made of resentment, locked away in a dark corner.

“My blood is needed to undo the seal,” Wei Wuxian said. “It will be fine.”

Lan Wangji looked back to him and asked, “Do you intend to stay like this from now on?”

“What’s wrong with staying like this? What, is it not good enough for you? This mountain is even bigger than the Cloud Recesses! The food is much better too.”

“You’d barely had enough money for potatoes!” Jiang Cheng hissed.

Wei Wuxian, unsurprisingly, didn't respond.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji said at last. "You know what I mean."

Those words made Wei Wuxian pause.

Then, after a bit of consideration, he laughed once more and said, "Lan Zhan, you really are… something else. I'd moved the conversation to a different topic, but you brought us right back here again."

"Because this is important, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered as well. There were dark circles under Wei Wuxian's eyes, most likely left over from sleepless nights of work to bring Wen Ning's consciousness back. He was far thinner than he'd been before — not quite as bad as the first time he left the Burial Mounds, but close. Far too close.

Wei Wuxian's smile dimmed and then, when he opened his mouth to speak, he suddenly began to cough. Lan Wangji rushed to his side at once, just in time to see some of the blood that rose up in Wei Wuxian's throat. Hanguang-jun reached over to grab Wei Wuxian's hand.

"What are you doing?" Wei Wuxian asked, stepping back at once. It wasn't technically a flinch but it certainly resembled one. There was a tentative wariness in his eyes. The lack of trust cut a wedge between them, keeping Lan Wangji from stepping forward.

Lan Xichen frowned deeply. Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had trusted each other immensely before the war began. In the cave of the Xuanwu of Slaughter, they'd made a perfect team. Now, however…

'Why won't he let Wangji heal him?' Lan Xichen wondered. 'Surely he could trust him for that.'

Some ways back, Lan Qiren looked away, disliking where his own thoughts were going.

(The reaching motion Wangji had done momentarily reminding Lan Qiren of Qingheng-jun instead.)

However, as everyone watching the simulation knew, Lan Wangji meant no harm.

"Your injuries," he said.

"No need, no need. Why bother using spiritual energy for such a small wound? It'll get better after I sit around for a while."

"Wei Wuxian, just let him help you!" Madam Yu snarled, her concerns, for once, being for the boy instead of against him. "If you're bad enough that you start coughing up blood at random, you need some treatment! Lan-er-gongzi is the strongest cultivator there, aside from you. If you would just let go of your damn arrogance for a moment-"

"You have no right to describe him that way," Wen Ruohan snapped at once. Madam Yu paused and turned toward him, a look of shock on her face. Rather than looking back at her,

Wen Ruohan turned to Jin Guangshan instead.

Understanding the meaning of the gaze at once, Sect Leader Jin stepped forward and said, "We Jin are much closer to the Jiang than the Wen. If necessary, we'd be happy to provide support at any time on the Chief Cultivator's behalf."

Now that those words had been spoken out loud, the position the Wen and Jin Sects shared on the matter was abundantly clear. Jin Guangshan wasn't sure why Wen Ruohan didn't want the others to question Wei Wuxian's refusal to accept treatment, but he saw no reason to ask.

(The Jins' involvement in the Sunshot Campaign and the subsequent labor camps made the alliance between Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan questionable at best. For now, a bit of appeasement seemed wise.)

As everyone fell silent once more, Lan Wangji watched silently, looking back and forth between Wei Wuxian and Wen Ruohan with narrowed eyes.

'Even Wei Ying thought he'd been a little arrogant at this point in his life. When he was forced to watch his younger self from Nie Mingjue's perspective, he'd been rather embarrassed,' Lan Wangji thought. 'I can see why. He's refusing to even consider something going wrong. He won't let me help, he won't hear my concerns. He…'

He was still using demonic cultivation.

However, could Lan Wangji really say that the color of his skin or the exhaustion in his eyes were because of that? Was figuring out a way to restore consciousness while simultaneously being considered an enemy of the whole world somehow not enough reason? It would be more surprising if he wasn't exhausted, given the state of things. He had an entire community to feed and barely enough money to order a meal. Wei Wuxian refused to give up demonic cultivation — to even consider things going wrong.

Because, at this point, the things he was doing were the last options he had. He-

"What was that?! You'll get better after some sitting around?" Wen Qing shouted as she stormed inside. "Come here!"

She slapped Wei Wuxian on the back once, making blood fly out of his mouth. Lan Wangji helped steady him, only relaxing upon realizing that Wen Qing had merely removed the corrupted blood from his body. After making sure Wei Wuxian was alright, he turned his attention to the fourth person to enter the cave.

A now-awake Wen Ning looked back.

Wen Qing took in a deep breath, her heart clenching with both grief and gratitude at the sight of her dead-but-not brother. It was far from a good situation, but…

It was still her brother. She could accept this if she had to.

After watching Wen Ning for a few seconds longer, confirming that the corpse's mind had returned, Hanguang-jun began walking away.

“Lan Zhan?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Lan Wangji glanced back, explaining, “It’s time for me to go.”

"Huh?" Wen Ning asked. "Wait, is it because — I can go if you want! I was just-"

Wen Ning's fluster of panic was interrupted when A-Yuan rushed toward Lan Wangji with a frantic cry of, “Brother!”

The child tried to chase, but Wei Wuxian picked him up before he could, glancing up at Lan Wangji to say, “You’re going already? I’ll see you off, then.”

Lan Wangji stayed silent.

In that silence, A-Yuan looked up and asked, “Brother, you won’t be eating here?”

‘Only a monster would be able to say no to that face!’ Nie Huaisang thought, admiring A-Yuan’s cuteness. ‘I really have to learn how to make an expression that looks like that.’

Similarly unable to resist, Lan Wangji reached forward and patted A-Yuan on the head. The young boy lit up at the action.

“You wanna know a secret, Gege?” he asked. “I heard there’s going to be a lot of good food today!”

And if Lan Wangji stayed with Wei Wuxian — as his other-self would thirteen years later — he would get to try.

However-

“This brother here has food waiting for him in his own home. He won’t be staying,” Wei Wuxian announced.

Lan Wangji tensed. They had spoken amicably earlier, lacking most of the aggression that had appeared between them during the sunshot campaign. It had gotten worse just now, but…

But, despite the disappointed ‘oh’ A-Yuan gave, Wei Wuxian’s gaze remained firm. Maybe he didn’t want to ruin Hanguang-jun’s reputation; maybe he thought requesting that he stay would be asking too much; maybe he didn’t trust him fully; maybe he just wanted Lan Wangji gone. Regardless, he certainly wasn’t trying to make Hanguang-jun stay.

And Lan Wangji had already forced himself on Wei Wuxian once.

Even now, the image of Wei Wuxian being pushed against a tree remained rooted in his mind.

After doing that, how could he even consider trying to stay when Wei Wuxian didn’t want him to? How could he dare to insert himself into Wei Wuxian’s life, when he so clearly didn’t belong? They were managing to survive on their own; if he wasn’t wanted, Lan Wangji had no right to intervene.

~~Except, as Lan Wangji couldn't help but recall, his far-future self would do exactly that, literally dragging Wei Wuxian back to the Cloud Recesses to ensure he didn't escape. Hanguang-jun's intentions hadn't been clear, so he stuck by Wei Wuxian's side until they were. All of this was done by a Lan Wangji who had experienced Wei Wuxian's death.~~

~~As much as it felt like they'd gone over so far, there was clearly a lot left for them to learn.~~

Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and A-Yuan (still tucked under Wei Wuxian's arm) walked toward the edge of the Burial Mounds, unimpeded by the corpses all around. Eventually, they reached the foot of the mounds, both coming to a stop. They waited for a bit, the cool evening air brushing past, but, still, neither spoke.

The silence felt heavy.

"Lan Zhan, you asked if I intended to stay like this from now on," Wei Wuxian began. "To be honest, I'd like to ask you something in exchange. Aside from this, what else can I do? Give up the demonic path? Then what about everyone here on the mountain? Give them up? I can't do that either!"

A conclusion the real Lan Wangji had already come to. An answer that made Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, Lan Qiren, and Jiang Cheng have to look away. After all, this situation wasn't an unavoidable result of the behavior of outside forces — it was a direct result of their actions. Maybe not just their actions, but that was undeniably part of it.

With the situation as it was, what right did they have to judge Wei Wuxian at all?

"If you were in my position, I'm sure you would make the same choice I did."

Hanguang-jun said nothing in return.

Lan Qiren looked back briefly, then had to look away once more. A bitter taste formed in his mouth.

Wei Wuxian gave a small, helpless shrug, concluding, "Nobody will give me a nice, broad road to walk on. There's no way for me to protect what I want to protect while giving up the ghostly path."

Wen Qing, Wen Ruohan, and Nie Huaisang couldn't help but direct their gazes slightly downward at that, to the place where Wei Wuxian's core should be. Their movements caught Lan Wangji's attention. Although his face didn't change at all, his mind began to turn.

When Wei Wuxian had pushed away his offer of help earlier, Lan Wangji had interpreted it as, quite simply, a rejection. Wei Wuxian didn't want to be indebted to Lan Wangji and so refused the offered qi. Now however, another thought came to the Second Jade.

'Is something… wrong with his core?'

No answer came. Even the simulated Lan Wangji remained silent, having no response to Wei Wuxian's words.

"...Thank you for keeping me company today," Wei Wuxian said. "Thank you for telling me the news about my Shijie's marriage too."

Jiang Yanli flinched at the reminder.

"Let the self judge right and wrong; allow others to direct praise or blame; let gains and losses remain uncommented on," Wei Wuxian said. "I don't care what others say. I know what I should do. I believe I'll be able to control it."

Hanguang-jun's gaze turned tired. He wasn't satisfied with an answer like that, but there was nothing more he could say.

Wen Ruohan gave a light hum.

Wei Wuxian's priorities and thought process were completely alien to Wen Ruohan's mind. The Chief Cultivator focused on nothing but the gains and losses every time he had a choice to make. To him, it seemed like the only thing worth considering.

If Wei Wuxian had resembled him in that way, he would never have gone against the world to save the Wens.

However, if he didn't do that, he wouldn't be Wei Wuxian.

Lan Wangji looked down at A-Yuan one last time, then up again. He and Wei Wuxian made eye contact, neither speaking a word. The pair then nodded once at each other and bowed respectfully.

(For all they knew, they would never see each other again.)

After that, Lan Wangji turned and began walking away. As Wei Wuxian watched him depart, that strangely blank expression he'd worn before returned.

(He'd been so excited when he first saw Lan Wangji in Yiling. It was the first person from his old life he'd seen in months. For all Wei Wuxian knew, it was also the last person from his old life he'd see for a good while longer.)

Lan Wangji clenched his hands into fists, frustrated beyond belief and yet unsure of what he wanted his other-self to do. The people in the Burial Mounds weren't living well, but they were surviving. They were excited to build homes for themselves, escaping what the great sects — including the Lan Sect — had done to them. Would they trust him enough to accept his money? Would they feel comfortable being indebted to someone like him? Would they still be able to sleep at night if he had stayed? Would he have actually been able to help them so long as they were considered public enemy number one?

Maybe. It was hard to say.

(But, after Phoenix Mountain, the one thing he couldn't do was force Wei Wuxian to let him stay.)

And thus Hanguang-jun walked on, his shadow getting smaller and smaller in the evening sunset. Wei Wuxian watched silently, still holding A-Yuan in his arms.

Lan Wangji's bright eyes seemed to dim.

Then, at last, Wei Wuxian began to return. Step by step, he walked up the mountain, farther and farther from the second jade of Lan.

'Come to think of it, I told Lan Zhan I'd treat him to lunch, didn't I? But then, with everything that happened, he ended up paying for it anyways,' Wei Wuxian realized. 'Well, Lan Zhan's so rich anyways, it's no big deal if he pays for me once more. He only bought a meal and a few children's toys; he must still have some money on him. If worst comes to worst, I'll treat him next time.'

It was exactly as Lan Wangji had feared it would be: Wei Wuxian felt like he had to pay him back for something as simple as a single meal. For everything that their older-selves would become, the versions of them here were barely even friends. Of course Wei Wuxian would feel bad for owing a mere acquaintance so much. Was it any wonder he'd reacted so negatively to Lan Wangji after being brought back to life?

'Why is he here?' Wei Wuxian had thought, stepping back. 'I need to get out of here.'

Because Hanguang-jun, like any other righteous cultivator, would want to stop a wielder of resentful energy. It was a natural assumption to make. After everything…

'Wangji, a question for you: do you actually hate me?'

Lan Wangji continued writing.

'Hey! You're still ignoring me,' Wei Wuxian complained. 'What should I call you to get a response? Wangji? Wangji-xiong? Lan Wangji?'

No answer came.

'Lan Zhan!'

Lan Wangji could still recall how embarrassed he'd been to watch those scenes at the time. Looking back on it now, the Cloud Recesses felt so painfully distant.

(They had seen it only a few days ago — less than two weeks had passed since then! And yet…)

'GET LOST!' Lan Wangji screamed.

That moment had, at first, been embarrassing to watch. Later, Wangji had found himself looking back on it fondly, sad for what had been lost since then. Now, the only thing he felt was regret.

Step. Step. Step.

Wei Wuxian was continuing up the mountain. In A-Yuan's hands, the grass butterflies fluttered about.

"Xian-gege, will Rich-gege come again?" A-Yuan asked.

Wei Wuxian laughed, wondering, "Who's Rich-gege?"

"The rich gege is Rich-gege."

"Who am I, then?"

"You're Brother Xian. Poor-gege."

Wei Wuxian faltered, clutching at his chest as if he'd just been stabbed by those words. Then, growing a devious grin on his face, Wei Wuxian snatched the butterfly in A-Yuan's hands away.

"You like him just because he's got money?"

"Give it back! He bought it for me!" A-Yuan complained.

Madam Yu had heard her husband mention, once, how good Wei Wuxian was with kids. She had been in the process of berating him for picking the boy as head disciple, so the words hadn't really meant much to her then. Looking at this now, however, she could see what he meant. No matter what he was going through, Wei Wuxian was always willing to put on a smile for the child.

(When was the last time she had genuinely smiled at her own kids?)

With a grand flourish, Wei Wuxian set the butterfly down on his own head, declaring, "I'm not giving it back. You even called him 'dad!' What about me? You've only ever called me 'brother,' an entire generation below him!"

"I didn't call him dad!"

"I won't listen to another word! I know what I heard!"

Unable to resist, Jiang Yanli began laughing a little, covering her mouth with her hand. Even if they didn't know the far future, just this would already make it clear that Wei Wuxian would be a great uncle for Jin Ling, someday.

~~If he had ever been allowed to see the boy.~~

~~If Jin Ling hadn't stabbed him as soon as he found out who he was.~~

A-Yuan's protests continued:

"I didn't call him that! I didn't!"

“I don’t care anymore! I want to be someone above brothers and dads in seniority! So, what should you call me?”

However, after thinking for a moment, A-Yuan admitted, “I don’t want to call you ‘mom.’ That’s weird.”

“What?” Madam Jin asked, breathing out a disbelieving laugh.

“Who told you to call me ‘mom?!’ The one with higher seniority than them is the grandad! Say ‘grandfather!’ You don’t even know this?”

“How did the boy even come to a conclusion like that?” Jin Guangshan wondered.

Wen Ruohan hummed lightly, supposing, “He is currently living in a community with Qing-er. Perhaps that is influencing his perception of things.”

After thinking it over for a moment, no one could disagree. Small smiles formed on most of their faces. Watching Wei Wuxian interact with A-Yuan felt so soothing in comparison to everything else that had happened.

“Do you really like your Rich-gege so much? You should’ve said so sooner. If I’d known that, I would’ve asked him to take you away earlier!”

A-Yuan’s eyes widened in horror.

“His sect is rich, but it’s very scary! He’d take you back, lock you inside, and have you copy scriptures all day!”

“I’m sure A-Yuan would be a much better behaved child than you, Wei Wuxian!” Lan Qiren couldn’t help but snap. Wei Wuxian was righteous, yes, and, given that he had grown up under Madam Yu’s system of punishments, Lan Qiren could understand why Wei Wuxian disregarded the rules as easily as he did. That said, nothing would make Lan Qiren forget having to watch his drunk nephew tie Wei Wuxian’s wrists up with his forehead ribbon! A-Yuan would make an infinitely better Lan!

(Granted, of course, that the Lan Sect was willing to spare his life. Lan Qiren couldn’t imagine anyone in the main branch killing a child for their last name. However, many, many things in the simulation had seemed almost impossible to believe. They had happened regardless.)

“R-rich-gege wouldn’t do that!” A-Yuan protested.

“I wouldn’t be so sure about that. You wouldn’t believe some of the things he did to me back in the day! I spent hours upon hours trapped in that library of theirs.”

A-Yuan’s eyes widened.

“I won’t go,” he whispered, shaking his head. “I still want Granny.”

“You want Granny but not me?”

“No! I want Xian-gege too!” He held out his hand, counting one by one. “Also Rich-gege, Qing-jie, Ning-gege, Uncle Four, Uncle Six-”

“Alright, alright,” Wei Wuxian said, setting the butterfly back in A-Yuan’s hands. “That’s enough. I’m going to be drowned amongst all the people!”

A-Yuan put the butterfly back in his pocket, watching Wei Wuxian’s hand with wary eyes. Then, after ensuring the toy was safely secured, he looked back in the direction Lan Wangji had just left from. The man could no longer be seen.

“...Will Rich-gege ever come back?” he asked.

Lan Wangji stopped breathing for a moment.

Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, didn’t falter at all. His smile remained just as strong as before as he bounded up the mountain, bouncing A-Yuan a bit in his arms.

(However, even then, it took him a few seconds to respond.)

“...Probably not,” he admitted at last. “I doubt he’ll come back again.”

“Why not?”

“There is no ‘why.’ In this world, everyone has their own things to do… their own paths to walk. He’s busy enough already; how could he have time to flutter about down here?”

“Wei Ying-”

‘We aren’t walking on the same sort of path anymore, after all,’ Wei Wuxian concluded in his head.

Wen Ruohan huffed a half-laugh at that. Nothing that had been said was funny, but the sound came out of him regardless. A situation like this, for someone like Wei Wuxian… it just made no sense.

‘You’re doing this… all for the Wen Sect?’ Jiang Cheng asked. ‘Wei Wuxian, do you have a savior complex or something? Is it that you’ll die if you don’t stir up trouble?’

Calling it a ‘savior complex’ wasn’t quite right. It wasn’t as though Wei Wuxian wanted to sacrifice for this. If he saw any other way of keeping the Wens safe, he would have taken it. He wasn’t trying to be a hero; he just couldn’t accept the camps.

(A feeling that was costing him quite a bit.)

As Lan Wangji had noticed, Wei Wuxian was concerningly pale. Right now, he was cut off from almost everyone he had ever known. He had no golden core anymore and the person he gave his to had declared him an enemy of all the sects. As Wen Ruohan watched Wei Wuxian carry A-Yuan up the Burial Mounds, he felt his hands clench into fists.

“What a waste,” he muttered again.

The youngest Wen was similarly downtrodden. A-Yuan asked no further questions, but the simple “oh” he gave transmitted his feelings well enough. When Wei Wuxian noticed A-Yuan’s reaction, he held the boy out in front of him, bouncing him up and down a bit.

“Ah, whatever. Who cares about the nice, broad road?” Wei Wuxian asked, projecting loud confidence in every way he could. “This is fine! We have everything we could need right here! The radishes we grow are fit to feed the emperor. No matter how dark it gets, I’ll keep walking the single-plank bridge all… night?”

Just as Wei Wuxian was getting to the end of his sentence, he realized that the light surrounding him didn’t match the word ‘night’ at all. He looked around. Compared to before, the area was almost completely unrecognizable. The shacks had been swept clean, the weeds were removed, and red lanterns hung on the sides. A soft yellow glow filled the mounds.

Wen Qing stepped forward, a warm smile on her face.

“Don’t just stand there,” she said. “Hurry! It’s time for dinner.”

Wen Ning, Granny, Uncle Four, Uncle Six, Aunt Three — everyone stood behind her, waiting for Wei Wuxian to come.

Not too long ago, those same people had cowered before Wei Wuxian, terrified of the power the Yiling Patriarch could invoke. Even after they lost their fear, there had still been a distinct separation. ‘The Yiling Patriarch’ and ‘the Wen Remnants.’ That was exactly why Wei Wuxian had left earlier. Wen Ning’s return to consciousness had been a moment for him to spend with his family; Wei Wuxian didn’t belong.

“Aren’t you going to come?”

Slowly, the shocked look on Wei Wuxian’s face turned into a smile. He laughed a little.

He walked over to them. No one backed away.

Which was a good thing. Of course it was a good thing.

So why, then, did it make Jiang Cheng’s chest hurt so much?

(Jiang Yanli’s eyes had gone a little dim. Despite the smile on her face, her expression didn’t really look happy. They had seen Wei Wuxian in the Jiang Sect after the war. He wasn’t teaching, he wasn’t playing — he would barely even smile. He couldn’t recognize most of the disciples of the Jiang Sect. Sure, he had still behaved somewhat normal around Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli, but even they had noticed how different he was being.)

(Or, to put it another way, how different the people around him were. In the past, the bright young master of the Jiang Sect had been the fourth most sought after marriage partner there was! Now, the Yiling Patriarch incited nothing but fear.)

(It was only in this small safe-haven that he could truly be free.)

As Wei Wuxian sat down, conversation began anew. The food that had gone untouched all this time was finally being eaten. Wei Wuxian was served a plate as well and, as chopsticks flew through the air, the party began to reach full-swing.

"You've worked hard, these past few days," Wen Qing commented suddenly. Wei Wuxian did a double take.

"What's this?" he asked. "You're being so nice to me all of the sudden! Should I be scared?"

Wen Qing rolled her eyes once but then, softly, continued, "Everyone wanted to eat with you and thank you. However, since you've been running around or shutting yourself inside your cave for days on end, they had to wait. They didn't want to disturb you. They thought you didn't like interacting with others and didn't want to talk to them."

A statement so fundamentally opposed to the Wei Wuxian from the Cloud Recesses that it was almost hard to swallow.

A statement that seemed to match 'the Yiling Patriarch' just fine.

(But, despite that reputation of his, Wei Wuxian's true nature seemed to have been uncovered by the Wens bit by bit. Now, not a single one looked scared.)

"A-Ning woke up today, so Uncle Four said we had to have dinner with you no matter what. It's fine if you ate while you were outside. At the very least, have a couple drinks."

Wei Wuxian brightened up, asking, "There's drinks here? Wine?"

"Yeah, there's wine, there's wine," one of the aunts confirmed with a laugh. "Fruit wine, made from wild fruits on the mountain! It's quite rich!"

Just like those shacks of theirs, they had to make do with what they had right there.

And yet, now, they acted like they had all the wealth in the world.

Wen Ning, squatting beside the table, explained, "Uncle four likes to drink as well. He knows how to brew berries so he made these specially for today. He's been trying a lot for the past few days."

"Really? Then I'll have to try some!"

Hearing her brother speak, Wen Qing's eyes widened a little. In part, of course, for the words themselves. The sheer scale of what Wei Wuxian had done for them was settling in once again, now that she got to see what each member of her family was now able to do. However, more than that:

'A-Ning isn't stuttering anymore,' she realized. 'As a corpse, he's too stiff and needs to talk more slowly. That's keeping him from tripping over his words by accident, too.'

It would probably still happen if he was especially nervous, but this change stood out starkly nonetheless. It wasn't just his appearance that was different, now.

Once, the phrase 'the Ghost General' had filled Wen Qing with a disgusting, nauseating, sinking feeling. However, it was still her brother. He was certainly different now, but that didn't mean it was all bad.

As she looked back out at the scene before her, she felt the pain in her heart start to soothe.

"It really is rich!" Wei Wuxian declared, licking his lips after taking in his first gulp of the wine. He reached over, grabbing some more. It was only a few words, but every Wen there started to beam brighter than the sun.

(Wasn't this how the Wen Sect should be? Wasn't this what their sun should mean?)

Although it was covered by his robes, Wei Wuxian's chest still had the symbol of the Wen Sect branded atop. At the time, it had been a fun form of irony — a bit of proof, in Wen Ruohan's mind, that Wei Wuxian should belong to the Wens. A mark of ownership, to some degree.

'He's ours,' the Chief Cultivator thought once more.

However, even he was aware that that thought carried with it a slightly different meaning than it had back then.

The world went dark.

Lan Sizhui's voice returned:

"In just three days, almost every cultivator had learned a terrifying piece of news: Wei Wuxian, who had defected from the Jiang Sect and created his own home in Yiling, had created the highest level of fierce corpse yet. It was incomparably fast, strong, fearless, and ferocious. On top of that, its consciousness was preserved."

"...It's?" Jin Ling asked.

Wen Qing, who had been wondering the exact same thing, tensed slightly.

"This is an explanation of what 'every cultivator' knew. Describing him like this… felt most accurate.," Lan Sizhui explained.

Even the future's juniors seemed to have been overcome with a somber mood.

Lan Sizhui cleared his throat.

“Everyone was in shock. There could be no peace anymore! Wei Wuxian would definitely make these fierce corpses on a large scale, then use them to found his own sect and take over the cultivation world.”

Even the common folk had been whispering about that at the beginning of the segment. Regardless of the truth there, their fears were real.

“Many young would be attracted to the unorthodox evil, flocking to him one after another. The righteous path of cultivation would have a grim future. Dark times were ahead.”

After the scene they had just watched, such words seemed ridiculous.

However, nothing they could say to correct this would be heard.

“Civilians and cultivators alike grouped up, discussing what Wei Wuxian would do with the Ghost General he had made. However, now that he had returned to consciousness, the fierce corpse was mainly being used for manual labor.”

The general in question was shown, sacks upon sacks of goods hanging off his arms as he carried them up the mountain, an earnest expression on his face.

‘That’s… definitely Wen Ning,’ Nie Mingjue had to admit.

Their line of sight moved back a bit more, showing a hoe being lifted into the air. It swung back down, impacting against the hard ground. Its wielder was Wen Qing.

‘Dark times, huh?’ Jin Zixuan thought, raising one brow. Then, unable to help himself, his gaze drifted to his father once more. He looked away immediately after. There was no indication that Jin Guangshan had been involved in this set of rumors. Meng Yao might have been the one responsible, or maybe the Jin Sect wasn’t involved at all. There was no reason for him to blame his father.

~~Except, of course, for the things Jin Guangshan had already done.~~

Wen Qing's hoe swung down over and over again, reshaping the land below. The famed doctor now looked perfectly at place here. She had gone back to wearing her Wen robes — they could only make so many new clothes — but the once-white gown was now stained all the way through with dirt and grime. More and more dirt flew into the air all the time, landing on her and staining her cloak more black than ever before. After a while longer, she paused briefly to wipe some sweat off her forehead. Naturally, her eyes drifted to the side. And-

“Wei Wuxian, what are you doing?!” she shouted. “The harvest is so bad already! Stop eating food!”

Wei Wuxian paused, the large radish he’d been happily munching away at still in his hands.

“Go figure something out! We won’t be able to last like this!”

Wei Wuxian made a displeased expression but, nonetheless, complied with her request.

Next thing they saw, Wei Wuxian was sitting down on the ground, rolling a weed in his mouth. He watched Wen Ning, a thoughtful expression on his face. The fierce corpse was kneeling on the ground with A-Yuan, overlooking some plants with him.

"How can we have a better harvest?" Wei Wuxian muttered.

For all his talents, Wei Wuxian was much like Jin Zixuan in that gardening was not his strong suit. Now that Wen Ning was back, Wei Wuxian's skills would be best applied to figuring out a way to improve things for them all. The Jin heir breathed out a small sigh of relief, feeling less embarrassed by proxy now.

Meanwhile, A-Yuan and Wen Ning were trying to figure out which radishes were ripe for picking. They looked over the plants' leaves, stems, and heights, going through one by one. Then, finding one that seemed to match what they were looking for, A-Yuan made a bright smile and gave it a tug. The radish did come.

Along with a skeleton's hand, which was still gripping on.

"Uwagh!" Wen Ning gaped, the sound not resembling something even close to what a human could make. The Ghost General quickly snatched the radish from A-Yuan's hand, stuffing it (and the skeleton) back underground.

The future Jiang Cheng had said a number of things the real one didn't agree with. However, the man's assertion that the Burial Mounds were not a place suitable for growing food felt pretty undeniable, now.

Wei Wuxian gazed over at the place the skeleton's hand had just been. He stared and stared and stared. Then, with a snap, he grinned.

"Got it!"

An idea had come.

Madam Yu couldn't help but feel skeptical.

Once again, Wen Qing lifted her hoe into the air. She swung down again and again. Then, pausing to wipe her face, she glanced over.

"Wei Wuxian! What are you doing now?!" she demanded.

It was not the first time she had asked that and it surely wouldn't be the last. Wen Ning had always been such a sweet boy, so this was the first time Wen Qing had ever had such a troublesome younger brother.

But having the ingenuity and willingness to try out crazy new things was a large part of what it meant to be an inventor. Thus, when their view panned out to reveal an enormous seal Wei Wuxian had written on the ground in blood, no one could really be surprised.

“I have a bold idea!” Wei Wuxian declared.

Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan walked around, observing the characters Wei Wuxian had written in more detail. Writing out a talisman on the ground was certainly unorthodox, but so was basically everything else the Yiling Patriarch did.

(Besides, they probably didn’t have the money for proper talisman paper anyways.)

Despite her earlier shouts, Wen Qing was equally aware of what Wei Wuxian was capable of. She looked closely.

“What is it meant to do?” she asked.

Continuing to write the circle out, Wei Wuxian explained, “People can now be turned into walking corpses. The principles of circulating energy remain the same. So, why can’t we take these wilted radishes and bring them back to life?”

It was only now, with the circle already written out, that the watchers managed to recall what the first scene had been: the radish shaped like an elderly man running away while Wen Qing chased after. Wei Wuxian, sitting atop, had been cackling like mad.

“Okay, even with context that still makes no sense.”

“That doesn’t sound workable,” Wen Qing commented.

“Just watch and see!”

“I’m looking,” she conceded. “Not. Going. To. Work.”

Nie Huaisang grinned at the assertion, sitting on the edge of his seat.

The circle glowed bright red, coloring the nearby houses with its light. The symbols written down began to rotate, the circle spinning just a short ways off the ground. The wilted radish leaves below the circle twitched.

Many of the watchers jolted as well.

‘Up!’ the resentment seemed to call. ‘It’s time to get up!’

The sprouts continued to grow, becoming greener and livelier with every passing second. Wei Wuxian’s theory hadn’t been without merit. In some ways, it was successful. Wen Qing’s eyes widened.

“It… really worked.”

The world went dark.

“Well, that’s ominous,” Nie Huaisang said.

Nie Mingjue just sighed, muttering, "I'm starting to wonder if the spirits who put this together consulted your future self while they were getting this done."

"I doubt it. If I was in charge of the pacing, Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong would have gotten together long ago."

When the world brightened again, they were back in civilization. Hanguang-jun walked through the city streets, his zither strapped across his back. No one was speaking especially loudly, but, to someone like Lan Wangji, their words were easy to pick up.

"Did you hear?" a passer-by said. "Yiling is in trouble again."

Hanguang-jun's footsteps came to a halt.

"Eh? What happened?"

"Apparently, there's now a new kind of yao in that area."

"Wow."

The pair of civilians continued walking, leaving the watchers' line of sight. However, Hanguang-jun remained facing them, his brows furrowing just a little at their words.

'A new kind of yao,' he thought, briefly glancing in the direction of the Burial Mounds.

Lan Wangji's future self probably hadn't ever intended on going to the Burial Mounds again. Even the last time he was in Yiling he hadn't meant to end up there. However, if his help was needed now…

The simulation changed so that the Burial Mounds were in view.

The sudden influx of resentful energy barely even phased the watchers anymore, both because of their own experience and how much Wei Wuxian had dampened the hostility there. That said, they weren't completely unaffected. There was a new sensation here now. Little pinpricks of adrenaline seemed to tickle at their skin.

'Up! Up! Up!'* it said.

Lan Wangji stepped into the village once more. He paused for a moment, looking around. Although the shacks were shabby and crude, far more of them had been put up than the last time he was there. Fences were placed around the crops — mainly to keep track of the different crop fields, rather than any actual protection. There weren't any wild animals that would take them; the Burial Mounds were not a place for life, after all.

Or, at least, they hadn't been.

Lan Wangji scanned around once more, looking for movement of any kind. However, no matter how far he walked across the small, makeshift town, the results were inconclusive.

‘Where are the demons?’ he wondered.

Then, the radish leaves to his side shook. Lan Wangji jumped back, unsheathing his sword and pointing it at the suspicious plant. The leaves twitched a few more times, as though something underneath was trying to escape. The dirt shifted — the ground was breached!

A tired, dead-eyed, frowning radish popped out.

Even having seen it before, Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but give a heavy facepalm at the sight.

Lan Wangji stared. The radish gazed back.

. . . . . .

Seven dots appeared over Lan Wangji’s head. Crows cawed in the distance. The radish remained where it was.

“Waah!” A-Yuan screamed. Lan Wangji looked back just in time to see the toddler getting chased by a demon-eyed set of enlarged peas which bounced after him. Behind that, the other Wens were being assaulted by a collection of radishes, potatoes, and turnips, all filled with resentful energy.

That said, it was hard to describe them as dangerous. At most, they seemed to be nuisances, grabbing on tight to the heads and hair of their Wen victims. Uncle four was lying flat on his stomach, twitching as a large radish jumped on his back. Auntie Two was in a tug of war with one of the turnips, trying to pull a pot away from it. The Ghost General, the most fearsome corpse ever created, was buried under a large pile of potatoes, all of whom pulled at his hair with all the cruelty of a five year old bully.

Lan Wangji stared.

Then-

“Wei Wuxian! Stop! Stop now! When I get my hands on you-”

Wen Qing’s shouts were met with only cheerful laughter, Wei Wuxian smiling widely as he rode one of the radishes to escape Wen Qing’s grasp. The hoe she wielded swung over and over again, but the surprisingly speedy radish continued to evade.

Lan Wangji’s eyes followed him from one end of the Burial Mounds to the other then back again. All the while, he didn’t say a word. Then, at long last, he sighed.

He left without even bothering to greet Wei Wuxian.

Which was, probably, all for the best. As mentioned before, even with context that scene made no sense. That said…

"A-Xian… seems very comfortable around you all now," Jiang Yanli pointed out, sending Wen Qing a small smile. "I'm glad. He wouldn't risk doing anything like that with resentment if he was worried it would scare you. You're all much closer."

"Perhaps we're a little too close now," Wen Qing speculated, rubbing her brows tiredly. Really, Wei Wuxian was a much more wild younger brother than Wen Ning had ever been.

(However, there was no one Wen Qing trusted with her family more than Wei Wuxian. After what they had just seen, 'her family' seemed to include him.)

A small smile formed on her face.

The world faded to black.

Light returned, as always, and the watchers began to relax in their seats once more. Jiang Yanli was among them, pleased that the segment had ended on such a positive note.

Or, rather, she wanted to be pleased.

'This is good. It's wonderful that A-Xian feels so comfortable around them now. I would never ask for anything else.'

And she wouldn't. As she had said, she viewed Wei Wuxian as her actual brother. More than anything else, she wanted him to be happy. Right now, isolated as he was, the Wens could make him that way.

However, a certain level of loathing was there too.

'He learned… about my marriage… from Lan Wangji,' she thought again. Wei Wuxian wasn't invited. He wouldn't be able to come. He would never know what she looked like while wearing her wedding robes — never get to see her dressed up like that. His connection with her was almost completely cut off.

~~The Wens were taking her place.~~

There were still a few days left before her actual marriage. Maybe, just maybe, something would change.

(But, even if it did, that would feel like the bare minimum after all this.)

And Jiang Yanli-

"A-Li," she heard from her left. Looking over, she saw Madam Jin approach.

"Madam?"

“A-Li, don’t blame yourself,” she whispered. “You’re a member of the Jiang Clan marrying into the Jin Clan. That offers you wealth and security greater than almost any other. However… women in situations like ours have protection without power. Your abilities — the things you’d be able to do for Wei-gongzi — will always be limited. We’re not following you right now. For we all we know, you tried and tried but couldn’t manage to find anything that would work. I… acknowledge that you view Wei Wuxian as your brother. I will try to help you ensure this does not happen in our world.”

Madam Yu watched the conversation occur, remaining silent all the while.

“Ah,” Jiang Yanli gasped briefly, then, smiling a bit more genuinely, nodded once. “Thank you, Madam Jin. I will try to keep that in mind.”

“...You don’t agree?”

“I… I don’t disagree,” she clarified. “I know that what I can do is limited by many things. However, this is still… it doesn’t feel right.”

It didn’t. Not at all.

Jiang Cheng agreed completely.

(And yet his other-self was one of the main reasons the situation was as it was.)

(Jin Zixuan, whose sect was another one of those reasons, felt the same.)

The two heirs looked down, not feeling like talking to anyone at that time.

In direct contrast, Lan Wangji appeared unusually willing to speak.

“Xiongzhang?”

“Hm? What is it, Wangji?” Lan Xichen asked.

“What do you think… is going to happen to A-Yuan?”

That one question was enough to make almost everyone in the room freeze. They had all been wondering, but no one wanted to ask.

(Least of all Jin Guangshan, who was pretty sure the answer would make Wen Ruohan sever ties with him completely.)

“The Burial Mounds… at the beginning of the simulation, they said it was burned.”

Madam Yu huffed, pointing out, “They said many things back then. How many of them have been true?”

Which was a fair point.

That said, no one seemed especially reassured.

Wen Ruohan looked to the side for a bit, watching Wen Qing closely. His niece's disloyalty during the Sunshot Campaign debatably cost the Wen Sect their victory. However, in equal measure, it was the only reason why the clan was still alive. It wasn't really fair to say that Wen Qing had turned on her family. She had turned on him, yes, but not the Wens as a whole.

(Wen Ruohan had been thinking a lot about what he wanted to do once the simulation came to an end. He could still declare war on the other sects. It was entirely within his power to do so. He had wanted to, more than once.)

(Was it worth risking this, though?)

(If the suffering of the remaining Wens had been for something — to make a statement, to get information, to gain wealth is some way, shape, or form — maybe Wen Ruohan could have understood. As it was, however, in trying to prevent the cultivation world from continuing in its foolish ways, he had only managed to make them worse.)

At that moment, Wen Ruohan noticed Jin Guangshan approach:

"Your Excellency," the other said. "You appear concerned."

Wen Ruohan didn't respond.

"There must be many things you want to change," Sect Leader Jin continued. "I know, in having sent your sons out, you've lost a lot of your ability to interfere with the outside world. However, both my son and wife are still here. If you would like them to pass a message along to Wen-gongzi, I would be happy to help."

Wen Qing glanced over, watching carefully. Many of the other watchers tensed as well.

However, in the end, Wen Ruohan merely shook his head, explaining, "There's no need for that right now. Let's first see how things play out in there."

Calm returned to the gathered crowd.

A little ways away from Wen Ruohan, Nie Mingjue was scowling at the ground. He tapped his foot against the floor, frustration seeping through. When, out of the corner of his eye, he saw his brother looking around the room nervously, a deep pit seemed to form in Nie Mingjue's gut. He remembered what Huaisang looked like at A-Yuan's age.

And now…

"Xichen…" Nie Mingjue called out. "Do you… think we would kill a toddler?"

"...Us?"

Nie Mingjue nodded once.

(They had all been wondering, at least a little.)

"No, of course not," Lan Xichen said. "I mean…"

He paused, thinking a bit more. No matter what, he couldn't imagine himself ever being brought to that point. For Nie Mingjue, that only seemed possible if he was actively going through a qi deviation. Otherwise, surely, there was no chance of that.

But something was going to happen and that something would involve them.

A-Yuan smiled up at Wei Wuxian, giving a toothy grin.

"Of course not," Lan Xichen repeated. It was all he could say.

Jiang Cheng, on the other hand, couldn't even manage that assurance.

'At the first siege of the Burial Mounds, Jiang Cheng ranked first, and Jin Guangshan must have been second.'

There had been no hesitation in Wei Wuxian's mind when he asserted that the Jiang Clan had tried the hardest to kill them.

'Ugh,' the future Jiang Cheng scowled, shaking his leg. 'Where did this kid come from? Get him away from me!'

Jiang Cheng wouldn't kill a child. He wouldn't. Of course he wouldn't. He could be annoyed by one without wanting to kill them. Sure, the Wens had killed his family (~~not these Wens, though~~) and begun the war (~~Wen Ruohan had done that~~) and taken Wei Wuxian from him, but Jiang Cheng didn't want them dead.

(Wen Ning had saved him. Hadn't the future Jiang Cheng, in just the last segment, tried to skewer Wen Ning's corpse?)

As Jiang Cheng glanced over at Jiang Yanli, who sat to his right, he took in the growing horror in her expression. She was considering what might happen to A-Yuan. Even just intellectually speaking, Jiang Cheng knew A-Yuan didn't deserve to die. Yes, Jiang Cheng had wanted revenge, but…

'I wouldn't,' he told himself.

Wei Wuxian stretched his arms above his head, giving a soft sigh. Jiang Fengmian and Wen Ning had gone to the Wen Sect again, bringing with them the next prototype advancement to the Píngxíng Gateway. The pendant had proved to be a tremendous success. It allowed the wearer's spirit to leave their body, going through the world without touching anything. They could still be seen, but they couldn't interact with anything physically. In the meantime, it would place the user's actual body into a state identical to those in the Great Sleep. As a tool for information gathering, it was debatably unmatched.

However, that wasn't the intended purpose.

'See, I've been thinking about it,' Mo Xuanyu said. 'If I can send information to you all in real time, there's no reason I wouldn't be able to project information regarding 'me' into your world as well. My words, my movement… if we could create a visual of that, it would seem like I'm standing in the middle of the room. You could send back information on whatever's going on around me at that time. If we do it seamlessly enough, it'll be like my spirit's actually there.'

Wei Wuxian had been thrilled by the suggestion.

Actually making it work, however, was a long way away.

'Progress has to start somewhere though!' Wei Wuxian had declared when he was first bringing his plan up to Wen Ning and Jiang Fengmian. The two of them had paused, looked at each other, then shared a knowing smile.

'Alright then, A-Xian,' Jiang Fengmian had condeeded. 'If you think this is worth trying out, we'll be happy to help.'

Right now, both Jiang Fengmian and Wen Ning had talismans attached to their chests that would send information Mo Xuanyu's way in real time. Considering the weird things Wen Ning had heard last time he was in the Wen Sect, getting a third opinion on the matter couldn't hurt. Besides, it would let them test the moveability of the information-return technique rather well. Everything they heard or saw would be sent over, making Mo Xuanyu feel like he was standing right beside them. Maybe. In theory.

Regardless, a meeting between Jiang Fengmian and Wen Xu was almost impossible to keep secret. If an attempt to do so was found out, the other sects would begin watching them even more intently than they already were. As such, it was best for Jiang Fengmian to go to the Wen Sect through more official means.

And, as a result, the Jin Sect was well-aware he was gone.

"What? Aren't you going to invite us in?" Jin Zixun asked. "We came all this way. Receiving guests properly seems like the least you can do."

'After all, you're nothing more than a servant of the Jiang Sect,' he seemed to imply.

Wei Wuxian smiled back pleasantly, but, instead of inviting them in, asked, "Where's Meng Yao?"

There was a brief moment of silence between them.

A short while ago, Wei Wuxian was in Jiang Fengmian's office, sorting through some mission reports from the disciples. Thus, when Jin Zixun arrived at the sect, Meng Yao had been the one to greet him. He had taken over receiving guests for the Jiang Sect in recent days, giving Wei Wuxian more time to work on the Píngxíng Gateway. Under normal circumstances, he would listen to the guest's request and decide whether to dismiss them, to write down the request to show Jiang Fengmian later, or to allow them an audience with the sect leader at his earliest convenience.

Jin Zixun had demanded an audience with the sect leader at once.

The sect leader was not there.

Jin Zixun, young master of the Jin Clan, wasn't willing to accept that as a response.

(Under normal circumstances, the behavior he exhibited following that would be more than enough reason for Meng Yao to kick him out. He was disturbing the sect; it was best to make him leave. He might be high ranking, but Meng Yao had dealt with troublesome people like that before.)

(However, those previous times, the 'troublesome person' hadn't been Meng Yao's own cousin.)

"Young Master Jin," Meng Yao attempted, "Sect Leader Jiang won't be back until at least tomorrow. If you'd like, I can set up a room for you in-"

"No need," Jin Zixun dismissed. "Just bring some tea."

He began walking toward the main hall once more.

"Young Master?!" Meng Yao ran around, physically blocking him off. "As I mentioned before, Sect Leader Jiang isn't here right now. The main hall is currently being used, so, right now-"

"What's it being used for?" Jin Zixun asked. Meng Yao paused. Wei Wuxian had decided to temporarily repurpose the hall into a workshop for the disciples under thirteen years old. They were all gathered into groups in there, working on various puzzles as one. Unfortunately, explaining the truth of the situation might just provoke Jin Zixun more.

It didn't matter either way; Meng Yao was pushed aside and walked past soon enough. He gritted his teeth together.

However, this time, he didn't move to stop them.

Meng Yao owed Wei Wuxian greatly for the opportunity he had been given. He never would have been able to imagine he'd be invited into Yunmeng like he was. Additionally, Meng Yao was determined to win more of Wei Wuxian's favor through his work. If he did, the chances of him being able to meet Jin Guangshan increased exponentially.

However, between Wei Wuxian and Jin Guangshan's own nephew, it was clear who the more direct route was. If Meng Yao forcefully stopped Jin Zixun now — if he succeeded and, as a result, lowered the Jin Sect's reputation — Jin Guangshan might refuse to meet him on principle!

(Might view him as a nuisance, rather than a son.)

There were plenty of conceivable reasons for Meng Yao to fail at stopping Jin Zixun. For one, his cousin was a cultivator; someone who hadn't even formed a golden core yet wouldn't put up much of a fight. Additionally, Jin Zixun had brought with him at least a dozen people, all of whom were willing and able to push Meng Yao aside. Finally, considering their respective ranks in society…

Well, there were plenty of reasons Meng Yao might fail.

Thus, he stood aside.

When Jin Zixun's entourage walked past him, not a single one paid a second glance. Even while wearing formal robes gifted by Wei Wuxian, Meng Yao wasn't worth their notice. They continued all the way to the central doors, Jin Zixun's escorts throwing them open at once.

"Shixiong?" A-Lu asked from within. "Eh? No… who-"

"Huh? A bunch of brats?" Jin Zixun asked, raising a brow. "Get them out of here."

His subordinates stepped forward at once. Of course they did; this was what they were there for. Jin Zixun hoped to take advantage of Jiang Fengmian's absence to show the world — or, at least, the people of Yunmeng — that Wei Wuxian was still as far below him as before. After all, it would be rather difficult for Wei Wuxian to simply kick a young master like him out. With Jiang Cheng, Jiang Yanli, and Madam Yu still asleep…

'Still,' Meng Yao wondered, 'Does he not fear retaliation from Jiang Fengmian?'

Several children were picked up and thrown out of the main hall.

'No matter how easy-going Jiang Fengmian's personality is rumored to be, something like this will not go unchallenged. Even if they leave before the sect leader returns, this will not be without consequence. Maybe I misunderstood their goals? Or maybe I'm just misinformed about Jiang Fengmian. Or maybe…'

Meng Yao frowned.

'Or maybe Jin Zixun is just a man who puts no thought into anything he does.'

(Meng Yao's favorite tactic was reasoning someone into agreeing with him. Such a strategy would never work on someone like that.)

"You — you can't do this!" A-Yue protested loudly. "Da-shixiong said we could be here! You can't throw us out!"

Jin Zixun scoffed a bit at that, asking, "Do you have any idea who I am?"

A-Yue faltered a little at that question, recognizing the robes the man wore. Even leaving that aside, a preteen girl would inevitably have difficulty arguing with a man in his late twenties. She took a slight step back.

Just in time for her brother to straighten up and say, "Wait, I know you! You're the guy who challenged Da-shixiong to a fight with seven other people and still got beaten up!"

There were a few seconds of silence following that. From the back, Meng Yao cringed.

Fury burned in Jin Zixun's eyes.

“You little brats…” he hissed. “Wei Wuxian clearly taught you all wrong. Bring them here! I’ll give them some proper discipline!”

Two members of his entourage grabbed hold of A-Yue and A-Lu’s arms. A third reached into a chest and extracted a firm bamboo cane for Jin Zixun to use.

“Hey, stop it!”

“Let me go!” A-Yue shouted.

Jin Zixun had stormed in so abruptly — so suddenly — that Wei Wuxian hadn’t yet been informed. Meng Yao had told one of the other disciples to update Wei Wuxian on Jin Zixun’s arrival, but, given how far away Wei Wuxian had been, he probably wouldn’t hear about it for a fair bit longer. Most of the adults were out on night hunts, having been spread out quite widely by Wei Wuxian. Meng Yao was the only one here.

“Stop it! Stop it! Da-shixiong won’t let you-”

“That Shixiong of yours will understand,” Jin Zixun assured A-Lu, taking the cane he was handed. By now, every child except A-Lu and A-Yue had been taken outside. Jin Zixun raised his arm, bringing the cane up high.

Meng Yao stepped forward: “Young Master Jin-”

“Huh? Is there a problem?” Jin Zixun demanded, disinterested and annoyed. Meng Yao felt his mouth fall shut.

(Everyone referred to Jin Zixun as “Young Master Jin.” With Jin Zixuan still in the great sleep, that title could only be used to refer to one person. Until Meng Yao met Jin Guanghsan — until he proved his worth to his father — that would remain true.)

(If Meng Yao became an enemy of Jin Zixun now, it might always be true.)

But, behind Meng Yao, little Mo Yu was looking up at him with hopeful eyes. He seemed to believe that Meng Yao would be able to solve the issue easily.

~~Save A-Lu and A-Yue, like Wei Wuxian had saved them.~~

Mo Yu, looking up at him, had seemed truly at home in Wei Wuxian’s arms. The head disciple of the Jiang had already offered one of Jin Guangshan’s bastards a place to stay. He offered one to Meng Yao as well.

Jin Zixun was a closer connection to Jin Guangshan — to Meng Yao’s real, rightful home — but…

“...You are in Yunmeng right now, Young Master Jin. I apologize for the disrespect these two have caused you. I can assure you, the sect will punish them for what they did.”

Meng Yao’s words were proper and straightforward.

But, rather than listening, Jin Zixun merely raised a brow and asked, “Who are you? You’re not dressed like a disciple of the Jiang Sect.”

Smiling pleasantly, Meng Yao responded, “I belong to a new organization that Young Master Wei is trying to create. We have not yet decided on a name-”

“Ah, that one,” Jin Zixun scoffed. “It’s supposed to serve as a neutral party between the sects, isn’t it? Please. What right does a nobody like you have to try and command the Jin-”

“He’s not a nobody!” A-Lu shouted again despite the way tears were beginning to form in his eyes. “That’s Yao-ge. Meng Yao! He’s not nobody!”

Jin Zixun clenched the bamboo in his hand, looking a half-second away from swinging it again. However-

“Meng Yao?” one of his subordinates repeated.

“What?” Jin Zixun asked. “You know that name?”

Everyone turned their gazes on Meng Yao once more, and Meng Yao felt his stomach drop.

“He’s one of your uncle’s bastards, isn’t he? The one that got thrown down the stairs?”

Those last few words were all that everyone needed to hear to know exactly who he was. Mocking grins formed on their faces.

(So unlike the calm, impressed smiles Wei Wuxian had given Meng Yao every time he returned with a flawless report.)

“That’s right. I remember now,” Jin Zixun said, his attention redirected. “It was at my cousin’s birthday party, wasn’t it?”

‘It was my birthday, too,’ Meng Yao thought back, trying to keep his bitterness from showing. Voicing such an idea would only make the situation worse. He swallowed back the nervousness he felt, trying to smile politely.

“Ha. That explains it,” Jin Zixun muttered. “Seriously, what has the Jiang Sect come to? To think it’s considered one of the Five Great Sects when the sons of servants and prostitutes are littering its halls.”

Meng Yao’s smile didn’t so much as twitch, but, equally, there seemed to be nothing he could say in exchange.

“So, you’re Zixuan’s brother?” Zixun asked, mockingly. “I’m not sure I see the resemblance.”

“He’s not!” a small voice said from the side.

To Meng Yao’s horror, the source of those words were Mo Yu.

“Huh? What do you mean?”

“He’s not that person's brother, he’s my brother!” the child protested, tears forming in his eyes. “Our fathers are the same. He’s my gege!”

It took Meng Yao a second too long to realize he should have denied that immediately.

Jin Zixun cackled, “Another one? What, is the Jiang Sect trying to make a collection? Hey, bring that kid over, too.”

It didn’t take long for Mo Yu to be scooped up and carried to where A-Yue and A-Lu kneeled.

Meng Yao took a deep breath, trying to sort through his thoughts.

Jin Zixun wasn’t going to kill anyone. The kids’ bones probably wouldn’t get broken; their cores wouldn't be damaged. In all honesty, this was essentially bullying among children (disregarding Jin Zixun’s actual age). After it was over, people who heard about it from outside could easily be made to send their disapproval the Jin Sect’s way. Politically, it was a terrible choice for him to make.

On the other hand, if Meng Yao stepped in and turned Jin Zixun’s attention entirely on him, everyone who heard of this would have a very different reaction:

‘Oh, he went and disciplined one of Jin Guangshan’s bastards? Well… I guess that makes sense. The Jiang Sect and the Jin Sect are so close; I can’t believe they thought accepting a bastard onto their grounds was a good plan…. Huh? He wasn’t even part of the Jiang Sect? Oh, then I guess what the Jin did is completely fine.’

What happened to the children wouldn’t even be considered anymore. Jin Zixun would view him as a direct enemy and the Jiang wouldn’t be able to ask for retribution. Everything would be fine if Meng Yao stepped aside.

(The kids would simply lose all trust in him as a result.)

But there was no peaceful way to solve this, now. Jin Zixun had figured out Meng Yao’s identity; whatever he did now would affect his ability to join the Jin Sect later. On the other hand, if he could change Jin Zixun’s opinion about him — impress him, somehow, by helping him bring down the reputation of the Jiang Sect — if he could indicate he had worth, even as a subordinate — he might be able to go to the Jin Sect immediately.

But-

Wei Wuxian bowed once and saluted him, as though he were meeting an equal. Even after Meng Yao had agreed to join him, the respectful nods Wei Wuxian would send his way remained.

‘Gege!’ Mo Yu would smile, trailing after.

Meng Yao had frowned, scolding, ‘I have work now, A-Yu. We can play later.’

But Mo Yu had simply continued trailing after, waiting with surprising degrees of patience for Meng Yao to be done. He was used to waiting to get things he wanted. Of course he was; Meng Yao was, too.

Yet Wei Wuxian had offered them both a place in his world so easily.

By contrast-

'Seriously, what has the Jiang Sect come to? To think it's considered one of the Five Great Sects when the sons of servants and prostitutes are littering its halls.'

Logically speaking, it was an easy decision to make. Emotionally speaking, it was the simplest choice in the world. However, those choices directly countered each other no matter how Meng Yao looked at it. He had to choose.

Jin Zixun raised the bamboo cane above Mo Yu's head. When wielded by a cultivator, that cane could leave gashes on an adult. Jin Zixun would control his strength — surely he would! — but Mo Yu was so small, so tiny, so malnourished from the people who brought him up…

Jin Zixun wouldn't kill him.

He wouldn't intend to.

(Jin Zixun's father was the acting head of the Jin Sect until Jin Guangshan returned. Logically speaking, if Meng Yao could improve Jin Zixun's opinion on him, he should.)

(He really, really should.)

'Stupid,' Meng Yao thought. 'Stupid, stupid, stupid.'

He should have known better. He should have thought it through more carefully. He did think it through carefully, he just made the wrong choice. And now here he was: lying alone, thoroughly beaten, on the ground.

Jin Zixun, at least, would never allow him to enter the Jin Sect now.

(And, with his involvement, any criticism the public might have levied Jin Zixun's way went up in smoke.)

Suddenly, the doors to the hall slammed out against the wall. Wei Wuxian had thrown them open. He then looked down, his eyes flashing red when he took in Meng Yao's form.

'Resentful energy?' Meng Yao realized. He had heard of Wei Wuxian's work on the Great Sleep, but had never seen the other command it before. A shudder went down his spine.

Wei Wuxian had admitted he didn't trust Meng Yao fully. When they met, one of the first things he said was that other people had told him disparaging things about Meng Yao's character. And now…

“Wei Wuxian!” Jin Zixun shouted from behind, catching up to the Jiang from where they had been meeting. “Wei Wuxian, how dare you run from me?”

Wei Wuxian didn’t glance back, moving forward to kneel beside Meng Yao.

(A cane had been suitable, in Jin Zixun’s mind, for children. For a bastard like Meng Yao, a whip had made more sense.)

“...What did you do?” Wei Wuxian asked, taking off Meng Yao’s upper robe to view the injuries in full.

Jin Zixun laughed, responding, “It’s nothing you need to worry about, Wei Wuxian. Just a bit of family discipline. He is my cousin, after all.”

Meng Yao gritted his teeth together, holding back a mocking laugh.

‘I’m only family at times like this, huh?’ he thought.

“It’s not something concerning the Jiang Sect,” Jin Zixun continued. “I’ll take my cousin off your hands. You won’t need to worry about him anymore.”

(Meng Yao should have known. No matter how perfect an offer seemed, his family history would always be enough to drag him back down. Wei Wuxian had tempted him into a world of enemies and he had fallen for it, hook, line, and sinker.)

(What would happen to him, once Jin Zixun took him back?)

“What is he being punished for?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“He raised a hand against me. Look at this! I’ve got a cut all along my arm! That’s reason enough, isn’t it?”

It was. It really, truly was. Meng Yao had just been so stupid as to-

“Meng Yao.” Wei Wuxian spoke softly. “Tell me what happened.”

“Huh?” he asked.

Jin Zixun scowled, raising himself up and stomping forward to say, “Wei Wuxian, I told you already, this is a family matter. You know what he did — or are you really going to believe the son of a prostitute over me?”

Why would he? ‘Young Master Jin’ was Sect Leader Jin’s nephew; Wei Wuxian might not like Jin Zixun, but he had already said he didn’t trust Meng Yao. He had brought Meng Yao here partly to watch him. Now that Meng Yao had gone up against and injured Jin Zixun-

“I’ll give your words the same credence I would give anyone else’s, Young Master Jin,” Wei Wuxian said. “If he really did what you said, he’ll get the punishment he deserves.”

“Then-”

“Meng Yao,” Wei Wuxian repeated. “Tell me what you think happened.”

At those words, Meng Yao’s brain scrambled wildly for the story that would help him the most. ‘They came out of nowhere to attack the kids and me! I never had the chance to fight back!’ and ‘he found out who my father was and decided I deserved to be punished for just that!’ Maybe ‘I never attacked him; he’s just making it up as an excuse to get me!’ It would be partly true, anyways; so long as he didn’t admit to having attacked first ~~like an absolute fool.~~ He had been just a victim. Saying that would make everything fine.

It would be fine if Wei Wuxian believed him.

But Wei Wuxian already said he didn’t trust him.

If Meng Yao lied now, would he lose his place in both the Jin and the Jiang? But wouldn’t the same thing happen if he told the truth? Because he had attacked first. Jin Zixun had been keeping it on a level that could be excused as disciplining. However, when he raised a cane towards Mo Yu, Meng Yao had acted. ‘Young Master Jin’ now had a cut along his arm thanks to the small knife Meng Yao kept on him at all times. Meng Yao could claim that was an injury he’d had before he arrived, but…

Even while observing Meng Yao’s wounds, there was a certain chill in Wei Wuxian’s eyes. He was angry at Jin Zixun, but his personal feelings on the matter weren’t enough to make him respond. He would get all the information he could and then judge. If Meng Yao tried to lie… would he really be able to fool him?

“Meng Yao,” Wei Wuxian said once more. “What happened?”

Clear, silver eyes gazed down upon him.

And, in a brief stint of what Meng Yao could only view as temporary insanity, he spoke the truth:

“I did attack first,” he admitted, his voice at barely a whisper. “Jin Zixun… he was trying to discipline A-Lu, A-Yue, and A-Yu. I… wanted him to stop.”

Wei Wuxian nodded once at those words. His eyes seemed to burn scarlet red.

The investigation Wei Wuxian conducted was as thorough as it was merciless. Following it, the Jin were kicked out rather quickly. No, ‘kicked out’ wasn’t quite the right phrase. Wei Wuxian brought them back to the Jin Sect himself, throwing them down and informing the acting head that they would not be welcome in Yunmeng again.

That was a rule even a sect heir wouldn’t be able to make. It was one that would affect the relations between the Jin and Jiang. It was one that might even complicate Jiang Yanli’s engagement after she woke up. But Jiang Fengmian had told Wei Wuxian to protect the Jiang. If he didn’t agree with what Wei Wuxian had done, Wei Wuxian would accept punishment later.

(Madam Yu was going to be furious, wasn't she?)

(With good reason.)

'Are you trying to declare war on the Jin Sect? My son was attacked!' the acting head screamed.

'We acknowledge that fact,' Wei Wuxian said. 'I will be administering Meng Yao's punishment myself. You may watch, if you wish.'

The acting head had agreed. Thus, before both of them, Meng Yao was given 20 blows with a beating stick.

(An astonishingly light punishment, given what he had done.)

(Despite Jin Zixun's own feelings on the matter, the acting head of the Jin could acknowledge that Wei Wuxian was too important of a connection to simply give up. With his position as the head disciple of the Jiang, the favor the Wens were directing his way, and the accomplishments he had recently obtained….)

(Maintaining that relationship was worth a bit of anger from his son.)

As for Meng Yao, after the punishment was carried out, he noticed Wei Wuxian offering him a bit more information than he had been before. Nothing extreme, but the things he would say would not normally be told to someone outside the Jiang. Concerns he had; disciples who needed help; details about the finances. His trust in Meng Yao had increased.

(Thus, despite the punishment he'd received, Meng Yao had trouble regretting the choice he had made.)

Meanwhile, over two days' journey away, Jiang Fengmian and Wen Ning were within the Nightless City. Wei Wuxian had sent a letter explaining the situation to Jiang Fengmian. Jin Zixun, similarly, had sent a letter to Wen Chao. After the last meeting he had shared with Wen-er-gongzi, Jin Zixun was certain the other would demonstrate his support.

Those letters would take a fair bit longer to arrive, however. For now, Jiang Fengmian, Wen Ning, and Wen Xu stood facing each other, stuck in the middle of a rather awkward turn of events.

"What is that?" Wen Xu asked again, his eyes glued to Jiang Fengmian and Wen Ning's chests. The other Wens frowned, directing their gazes the same way but not finding anything of note.

(Of course not. The only people that sensitive to resentful energy were Wei Wuxian and those who had been under the Great Sleep.)

Jiang Fengmian hadn't expected Wen Xu to notice so fast, but didn't view it as a problem, either. The future Wei Wuxian had brought up and planned for the possibility before they left. Thus:

“I believe your father would disapprove if we discussed the Yiling Patriarch so publicly,” Jiang Fengmian said. After considering that for a moment, Wen Xu nodded and gestured for the other Wens to leave. Hesitant and confused, they nonetheless filed out. The door clicked closed, leaving just the three of them behind.

“So?” Wen Xu asked.

Rather than answer, Jiang Fengmian waited for a few moments longer. There was a crackle in the air. Both Jiang Fengmian and Wen Xu tensed moments before the space between them cracked open, a glowing red talisman appearing out of nowhere.

(Wen Ning, who, unlike them, hadn’t gotten that forewarning, eeped a little.)

“Mo Xuanyu would like to talk to you,” Jiang Fengmian said. “A-Xian noticed something a little off about the lingering resentment on you, even compared to the rest of us.”

That was true. The few times Wei Wuxian and Wen Xu met in person, something about the other had stood out to the Jiang disciple. It wasn’t the main reason they were there — that was helping the Yiling Patriarch investigate what Wen Ning heard from Wen Chao — but it was a good secondary excuse. After hesitating for just a moment longer, Wen Xu reached forward and touched the talisman. Jiang Fengmian and Wen Ning copied him a moment later.

One by one, their bodies fell to the floor.

When they opened their eyes again, they were in a field of the Cloud Recesses. ‘Mo Xuanyu’ — or, rather, the Yiling Patriarch — stood before them.

After having watched the simulation, there was no way for Wen Xu to not recognize him on sight. He saluted at once, bowing his head respectfully.

After a moment of hesitation, Wei Wuxian saluted back.

(It was a good thing he had never actually interacted with Wen Xu. If this was Wen Chao, things wouldn’t be nearly so cordial.)

“Senior Mo,” Wen Ning spoke up. “Does… does Young Master Wen really feel strange to you? Is something wrong?”

“I wouldn’t jump to conclusions quite yet,” Wei Wuxian responded. “I’m not 100% sure how good the transmitters are at sending information on resentful energy. That said, he does feel a little different from Unc — from Sect Leader Jiang.”

Wei Wuxian walked forward, doing a circle around Wen Xu. He then did one around Jiang Fengmian, then one more around Wen Ning. He looked back at Wen Xu shortly after.

Wen Ning was what people unaffected by the Píngxíng Gateway should feel like. Jiang Fengmian was how people who were affected should feel. As for Wen Xu… there appeared to be an additional layer of resentment resting on top. Wei Wuxian wasn’t sure what that was.

“Does Wen Chao feel like… Sect Leader Jiang?” he asked.

Both Jiang Fengmian and Wen Xu nodded. The younger Wei Wuxian had implied as much earlier as well.

Wei Wuxian hummed.

“I definitely feel the remnants of the Píngxíng Gateway. It’s nothing major; just a bit of lingering energy still hovering around you. But, on Wen-gongzi… there’s something else too.”

Something clingier. It wasn’t just connected to Wen Xu, it was actively working to stay attached to him. What it gripped onto was not his body, but, rather, his soul.

“Strange…” Wei Wuxian muttered.

Was he cursed? But the energy mainly appeared to have an attractive effect. It wasn’t doing anything; just holding on tight. Was someone spying on him? But Wei Wuxian couldn’t see any information being sent back. Was it just that Wei Wuxian’s resentful energy-sensing was thrown completely off when it was across universes? Maybe, but then why would his other-self have decided the same thing?

Wei Wuxian stared and stared and stared.

Assuming, for a moment, that the Píngxíng Gateway was the cause of this attachment, was there any reason for a result like this? It probably wasn’t a function of the time spent inside — this energy had a completely different goal than the rest. Was it a matter of location? No, then Wen Chao would be undergoing the same effect.

Something from the Píngxíng Gateway that would attach a clump of energy to a person….

The only thing Wei Wuxian could think of that even resembled that was the souls of the future’s juniors, which got attached to their parents as soon as information was sent back.

The souls of the future’s…

Wait.

Slowly, stepping back, Wei Wuxian felt his eyes widen. If, supposing for a moment, this was true…

“A-Yuan?” he gaped.

"Pardon?" Wen Xu asked back.

Chapter End Notes

Is Wen Xu canonically A-Yuan's father? Absolutely not! Do I want to create new OCs to be A-Yuan's parents? Also no. Do I want to use this to progress Wen Xu's character? You bet! Thus, I guess we're stuck with this. Also, in regards to Meng Yao, do keep in mind that he's a lot younger than we ever see him in canon. Bit softer around the edges. XD

That vegetables scene was MDZS Q episode 18! The Xuanli part was episode 19 :)

"A-Yuan?" Jiang Fengmian repeated. "Who is that?"

Mo Xuanyu — Wei Wuxian — paused, hesitating to answer. However, after several seconds went by, he seemed to realize the outburst he made deserved an explanation.

"..Ah." He cleared his throat. "A-Yuan is a child I… took in, after some time. I believe he's the reason for the energy that has been left on Wen-gongzi. It's not dangerous, so there's no reason to be concerned. You can tell Young Master Wei that it's not an issue, Sect Leader Jiang."

"I see. I'll do that, then," Jiang Fengmian promised, nodding once. Unfortunately, Wen Xu was far from satisfied with that explanation. He paused for a bit, staring at the ground.

'A child left traces on me? I never made contact with them by myself; why would they target me specifically?' he wondered. 'Is it revenge of some sort? If it's a child Wei Wuxian took in, then perhaps the war — the Sunshot Campaign — resulted in me taking the lives of that child's parents.'

But, even then, what good would adding a mark do? Was Wei Wuxian wrong, and it actually was harmful in some way?

(To suggest that was to doubt Wei Wuxian's skill; to suggest he was lying was to doubt Wei Wuxian's character. Even with the small amount of the simulation Wen Xu had watched, it was difficult to do either.)

But, if not that, then why would a mark of resentful energy have been left on him? And, for 'Mo Xuanyu' to have been able to tell right away, wouldn't the mark have to be something that indicated the identity of the caster? Could Wei Wuxian always identify the source of resentful energy? Did he just get a feeling as to the style of the caster — the specialty of the caster — the soul of the caster?

The soul?

Come to think of it, hadn't that been mentioned before?

'Any questions before I go, I guess?' Wei Wuxian had asked. This Wei Wuxian had been the one from their timeline — the fifteen year old, rather than the one within Mo Xuanyu.

Jin Zixuan, still inside the simulation, had spoken up, asking, 'Do you know if… sending this message back to us affected the people over there in any way? Like, is there anything tying them here?'

He had been worried for his not-yet-born son, and for the juniors who had done this for them.

'Tying them here?' Wei Wuxian had repeated. 'Well, I guess there was this one bit of data I couldn't figure out. It seemed like it tied the five souls that I presume used this to contact us — counting Mo Xuanyu — to other souls like the reincarnation cycle. Maybe.'

'Can you explain more?'

'Um… Mo Xuanyu's signature just fused with me for some reason, and then one connected to Shijie and Jin Zixuan, one went over to an engaged couple of Lans, one headed to Nightless City, and one went to Sect Leader Ouyang and his wife. I'm not sure what it means though.'

'It means my son will still be born,' Jin Zixuan had thought, lighting up.

Yes, they already knew about souls from the future fusing with them.

'One headed to Nightless City?' Wen Xu thought. 'Then… it fused with me?'

But that would mean-

"Patriarch," Wen Xu began. "The trace you're seeing on me… is it the same as what was on Jin-gongzi and Jiang-gunaing?"

Jiang Fengmian did a double take.

And Wei Wuxian's eyes widened slightly, the question catching him off guard.

"...I don't know," he said. "I haven't seen Jin-gongzi and Jiang-guniang."

But Wen Xu seemed to take that as confirmation, narrowing his eyes at that response.

Wei Wuxian gave an internal sigh.

'Ah. Maybe I should have expected this,' he thought to himself. 'I guess that's a reasonable conclusion to come to, given what I already told him.'

He continued to stare, watching Wen Xu with an intensity that was hard to match. For a moment, Nie Huaisang's words rang in his head.

'They're not complete idiots, Wei-xiong. Sometimes it helps to be a bit more honest.'

And sure, the new Sect Leader Nie wasn't exactly the picture of honesty himself, but that didn't mean he didn't have a point.

But…

‘If I tell him that A-Yuan can’t be born without him, what will he do? He’s the heir of the Wen Sect. An heir who’s now newly-aware that, in my world, the Wen Sect is gone. Leaving him aside, if Wen Ruohan finds out about this, I have no doubt he’d use A-Yuan as a tool against us.’

Wen Xu had burned down the Cloud Recesses. Wen Ruohan had called the other sect heirs in as hostages and then started a war. Would they really hesitate to use A-Yuan just because he was of their own blood?

Then what? Keep it a secret from Wen Xu? Hope he just winds up with the appropriate person by sheer chance?

(Was it really such a big deal if A-Yuan wasn’t born? The one in the future would be fine regardless. The boy’s soul in this world would simply rejoin the cycle of reincarnation once his possible parents passed. It would be a little weird, but Wei Wuxian might be able to accept that.)

(But, if A-Yuan was born and used against them — if he was put through pain because of this — tortured because of this — then Wei Wuxian would never be able to forgive himself.)

The Yiling Patriarch breathed out slowly.

(Wei Wuxian just needed a bit more time. If he was given a few months — a few weeks — he was sure he could figure out a solution. There would surely be a way for A-Yuan to be born safely. However, if A-Yuan was conceived now, then his soul would be attached to that body. Death would be the only way to separate it; he would be under Wen Ruohan's control from the moment he was born. Wei Wuxian needed time.)

However-

“Who… is the mother?” Jiang Fengmian asked, not quite able to stop himself. To the side, Wen Ning’s eyes widened as well. Although he didn’t have the full context, that last question was enough to clue him in.

There was no denying it now.

“...I don’t know who A-Yuan’s mother is. I took him in after she passed,” Wei Wuxian said.

And, just as the Yiling Patriarch feared, Wen Xu’s mind began to turn in a very specific direction.

‘If the trace left is made from resentful energy, then I’ll probably be able to identify her on first sight,’ Wen Xu thought. ‘Father… expressed interest in the four juniors who caused this. All the sect leaders did. I should find her and-’

“Wait…” Jiang Fengmian said. “We saw the four who sent everything back to us. None of them were… they weren’t Wen.”

‘Wen Clan ran amok, and people suffered. Righteous clans launched the Sunshot Campaign to oppose the Wen.’

The Wen Clan had been annihilated.

Jiang Fengmian paused and lowered his hand, pulling back awkwardly.

None of the children from the far-future had worn the robes of the Wen Clan, but that didn’t mean they weren’t blood related to them. After all, if they were, there would be no one they could tell.

(When the watchers had first heard of one soul going to Nightless City, they had assumed the Lan parents were visiting there for a time. The idea that one of the children they had seen was actually a Wen had never even crossed their minds. Of course it wouldn’t; the Wens were all supposed to be dead.)

“Who… is it?” Wen Xu asked. “Which of those four? I… no, I suppose it doesn’t matter.”

It was one of the two Lans, given where the other souls had gone. Either way, the child would be taken note of by everyone involved.

“I… Wen-gongzi, where are you going?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Wen Xu, who had been walking toward the exit sigil inscribed on the ground, glanced back.

“We’ve confirmed the reason my energy felt different, haven’t we? It seems like it’s time to act on that.”

“Act on it?” Wei Wuxian repeated. “You want to find A-Yuan’s mother? Now?”

The Wen heir nodded once.

Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes.

In the future’s world, Wen Xu burned the Cloud Recesses, killing Lan Wangji’s father. Then, Nie Mingjue cut off his head.

(Hanguang-jun had unknowingly raised the son of his father’s killer. A-Yuan bore no responsibility for what Wen Xu did, but that was still… hard to process.)

“Is… now really the time for this?” Wei Wuxian asked. “I would think it would be better to wait for stability to return to the sects before you start courting.”

“Is courting necessary?” Wen Xu asked back. “I only need the child; I don’t need the mother to love me. If she’s given a reasonable enough incentive, I’m sure I can make her agree to work with me.”

Wei Wuxian tensed just slightly, his mind racing wildly. If he was able to intervene directly there would be quite a number of things he could do. However, right now, he was a full dimension away. He couldn't even touch the people there, much less stop them.

Jiang Fengmian similarly frowned, pointing out, “If she bears you a son… you’ll probably be expected to marry her, Wen-gongzi.”

Jin Guangshan had bastard sons aplenty, but none of them were heirs. If Wen Xu wanted to do this to keep the politically-significant child close, wouldn’t he have to marry the mother? As a concubine, if nothing else.

“It depends on what Father decides,” was Wen Xu’s only response.

At that answer, Jiang Fengmian couldn’t help but shudder momentarily.

‘We have found an excellent candidate for your marriage,’ the family elders had told him. ‘Her family background, cultivation, and wealth are all factors that make her the perfect partner for you.’

Their comparative personalities were, of course, never mentioned.

And Jiang Fengmian, having just lost the support of his best friend to marriage, had eventually given in.

But-

“I… don’t think that’s-” Jiang Fengmian paused, trying to consider his words once more. “Shouldn’t you… meet her before deciding on that? What if she’s not interested?”

“I’ll increase her reward until she is.”

Worst come to worst, keeping her as a barely-noticed but highly pampered concubine should be fine.

(Once an actual wife was selected for Wen Xu, the two of them could just adopt his bastard child if need-be. The most important thing now was securing the Wen Sect’s position. With the foretold result of the Sunshot Campaign, the Wen Sect’s influence and reputation would become a fraction of what it had been before. Reclaiming that power was Wen Xu’s job as sect heir.)

(He had to act quickly. If this information was made public, the to-be mother could be assassinated or otherwise convinced to not comply. If all the gold in the world wasn’t enough to make her want a child, this likely wouldn’t work. There would be drugs she could take and various other choices she could make that would vastly lower the chances of her having a healthy baby. Given the soul situation, it was likely that their first child would be their only chance. If that one wasn’t born healthily, the next would probably house a different soul within them. Thus, if Wen Xu wanted this to work, the mother would have to comply.)

“You care for that child, don’t you?” Wen Xu asked, looking directly at Wei Wuxian. “Shouldn’t you want him to live?”

Wei Wuxian faltered just slightly. Did he want A-Yuan to be born? Yes — into a loving family that would allow him a childhood completely different from his time in the Jin Sect's camps and the Burial Mounds.

Did he want A-Yuan to be born as Wen Xu's son?

(But preventing the birth of A-Yuan felt a little too much like murder to easily accept.)

Wei Wuxian pursed his lips, unsure of how to answer.

"Our goals are aligned here, Patriarch," Wen Xu continued. "Once I find the mother, I'll use either financial compensation or political safety to make her agree. I have the full power of the Wen Sect at my disposal; I'm sure I can find some way to make this work. We conceived a child in your world; there's no reason this would fail now. It will be fine."

And he said it so straightforwardly — so earnestly — that, for a moment, that almost seemed like a reasonable thing to say.

And yet, at that moment, all Jiang Fengmian could see were the family elders surrounding him, telling him over and over again how ideal of a partner Yu Ziyuan would be.

(Hadn't that concession of his — his willingness to look for a logical match rather than a meaningful one — been exactly what caused Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli to have to grow up as they did? He wouldn't give his children up for the world but… didn't that say something about all this?)

"Young Master Wen, please… think about this a little more," Jiang Fengmian requested. "Perhaps… perhaps you could talk to her for a while first. See how you feel about-"

"No need," Wen Xu interjected. "There's no reason for us to waste time here. Once I find her, I'll convince her to help me."

And he seemed to think he really could.

By bribing her.

"Wen-gongzi, I-"

"This isn't a matter that involves you, Sect Leader Jiang," Wen Xu said.

The Jiang weren't entirely unrelated, but Wen Xu saw no reason to give Jiang Fengmian's opinion much thought. Someone who couldn't control his own sect — someone who might have left the simulation just to get away from the complicated mess that was his own family — wasn't worth any consideration. The relationship between him and Madam Yu was almost certainly coloring his view. That naive, soft, pathetic perspective didn't matter here.

~~Truth be told, Wen Xu didn't have any particular problems with Jiang Fengmian. However, Wen Ruohan didn't respect him, so Wen Xu didn't either.~~

"...We don't know the full details of what happened in my world," Wei Wuxian pointed out. "You're in a different time and a diverging dimension. We can't be making these plans about a woman we've never met. She's a person who can change. She might be willing. Or, for all you know, she'd rather die than help you."

"We'll find out when I try," was all Wen Xu said.

"But… Young Master Wen…" Wen Ning trailed off. "I-I mean, sorry, I don't mean any trouble! I just — it's just…"

He swallowed once. His heart felt like it was beating rapidly enough to jump out of his chest.

But Wei Wuxian had asked Wen Ning to help Jiang Fengmian out, if there seemed to be a need. Mo Xuanyu might not be entirely forthcoming, but the things he'd freely admitted to them in recent times — combined with the careful thought he put into everything he did — showed how much he was trying to help them. He'd already done a lot for them. Wen Ning trusted him, now.

And, as a side note…

'Wen-gongzi wants to-to have a kid?! I get, I mean, it makes some sense if it's someone known in the future, but… but he's not like Wen-er-gongzi. Wen-gongzi's never shown interest in something like that.'

To Wen Ning, it didn't make much sense. Thus, right now, it felt right to speak:

"Um," he paused, clearing his throat nervously. "Just… maybe Senior Mo is right and it would be best to wait a little longer. You've-you've never even seen the mother before, right? Do you… really even want to have a child?"

Wen Xu stared at him, his icy gaze making Wen Ning shiver a little. Then:

"...It doesn't matter. Serving the sect's interests is our job, Wen Ning."

Those words were enough to make Wen Ning flinch, but the boy did not move away. Rather, he moved closer, seemingly cutting Wen Xu's access to the exit portal off.

(Sure, they could phase through each other while in this realm, but the intent was still clear.)

Wen Xu sighed. What a mess.

(Wen Qing had shielded her brother from so much. That brat didn't understand what it meant to have true loyalty to the Wen.)

It didn't matter. The only one here whose opinion really mattered was Wei Wuxian. Wen Xu glanced back. As soon as he managed to get the Yiling Patriarch's approval (or, at the very least, a promise to not interfere) he could get to work. He would track down all the most likely candidates and scan them for traces of resentful energy. He would find the necessary woman and then-

And then-

And then, after he convinced her to help, that stranger would touch him and put her hands all over him and he would be inside her and they would be so close and he would feel her heat and fluids getting all over his body and neither of them would enjoy it but they had a duty to the Wen and just imagining that made Wen Xu want to throw up but they had to do it so they would.

"You were fine with the boy being a Wen. Is the issue just that he's now my child?" Wen Xu asked.

"It's not a problem in itself," 'Mo Xuanyu' responded. "I am, however, concerned for him. Is there a specific reason you want a child now, when the stability of the sects is so tenuous and uncertain?"

Wen Xu didn't bother to answer. They both knew what his reason was. Wen Ruohan had been quite clear before Wen Xu left the simulation. The heir's job was to maintain the Wen Sect's control over the Great Sects and ensure that Wei Wuxian was not being turned against them. From the reports Wen Xu had been given, Wei Wuxian was very attentive toward the children in his sect, spending a significant portion of time every day taking care of them with Wen Ning. Given what the future version had just said, there was a personal connection between Wei Wuxian and 'A-Yuan.' In addition, the watchers had been gradually growing fond of the future's juniors as the simulation progressed. They would care about that child too. A situation like that would inevitably impact politics down the line.

Thus, Wen Xu's job right now was to create that child.

(His own feelings on the matter weren't a factor.)

(Wen Ruohan had also never cared much about making children. He had done so because it was his job to. Wen Xu could surely do the same.)

(But, to make that work, he would have to leave right now. Leaving aside whatever the Wen Sect's enemies might do, Wen Xu's biggest obstacle was his own weak will. The longer he spent thinking about it — the longer he spent trying to imagine how a stranger might touch him — the more nauseous he became. Wen Ning thought him seeing her would change his mind? The woman in question could be the most beautiful person in the world. The idea of a stranger coming close and doing anything like that was revolting regardless of how she looked.)

The mother of A-Yuan would cooperate with him. She had to; it was her duty to the Wen Sect.

If Wen Xu could suppress his own feelings on the matter, she should be able to as well.

"Young Master Wen?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Wen Xu looked up again.

And, seeing that, Wei Wuxian couldn’t help but frown.

On Wen Ruohan’s orders, Wen Xu had burned the Cloud Recesses and killed Lan Wangji’s father.

(Not yet though. This version hadn’t done that yet.)

As far as A-Yuan’s safety was concerned, Wei Wuxian was completely unwilling to offer Wen Xu any trust.

(But A-Yuan wouldn’t be born without him. Was there a way for Wei Wuxian to wait for A-Yuan to be born and then steal him away? Was it even justifiable to do so? Putting that aside, was it possible? Even if Wen Xu did turn out to be a monster, the Wei Wuxian of the future couldn’t physically be there.)

Wei Wuxian wanted A-Yuan to be born. He wanted A-Yuan to be born and live happily. If Wen Xu was going to use him as a pawn, Wei Wuxian would have to do everything in his power to convince the heir to stop.

But...

'Do you... really even want to have a child?'

'It doesn't matter,' was Wen Xu's only response.

Wei Wuxian frowned, stepping back a bit.

(Did that really make sense? Wen Xu had died a few months into the war. Therefore, within the next few years, A-Yuan was probably conceived. Wen Xu was the heir of the Wen Sect. How could that have happened if Wen Xu didn't want it to?)

(But there was a grimace on the Wen heir’s face that he couldn’t quite hide, and that made Wei Wuxian hesitate to accept it as just that.)

“...Sect Leader Jiang, Wen Ning, can you… let me speak with Wen-gongzi alone for a bit?”

Both addressed parties jolted a little at the request, their brows furrowing in concern. However, after looking back and forth between the other two, they couldn’t help but falter. Wei Wuxian’s determination was clear.

“If you… need something — anything at all — you’ll call for us, right?” Jiang Fengmian asked.

Wei Wuxian nodded once.

“...Okay. Good luck.”

They vanished in a flash of red.

But Wei Wuxian's eyes didn't leave Wen Xu's even once.

(Wen Xu had led the attack that killed Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen's father.)

(Wei Wuxian had killed his brother.)

(Still-)

Wei Wuxian swallowed once. Throughout this whole conversation, Wen Xu had been oddly cordial toward 'the Yiling Patriarch.' Due to a limited number of interactions with the man during his life, Wei Wuxian had no idea how unusual that was.

(Then again, some people were like Jin Guangyao. People like that would appear polite no matter whether or not they felt any genuine respect.)

(Regardless…)

"Young Master Wen, what would you say to a deal?"

"A deal?"

"Yes. A-Yuan is important to me," Wei Wuxian admitted freely. "I want him to be happy."

Those who had seen more of the simulation would be able to confirm that in an instant. There was no point in lying.

"Young Master Wen, now that your relationship with him is clear, the situation changes a bit. If it interests you, I would like to provide some support to the Wen Sect."

Wen Xu's eyes widened.

'Wasn't he part of the Sunshot Campaign?' he thought, mentally backtracking over everything Wei Wuxian had said. 'Lotus Pier was destroyed by the Wen, wasn't it? He turned Wen Ning into a fierce corpse.'

Except, as was now becoming clear, the situation was a bit more complicated than that.

"...What help would you have in mind?"

"You've seen some of my inventions in the simulation, isn't that right? To begin with… would you be interested in learning how to assemble a compass of evil for your sect?"

And, well…

No one in their right mind could refuse an offer like that.

Wen Xu opened his mouth then closed it again, furrowing his brows in thought.

'A compass of evil? Even the Jiang haven't started working on making one of those yet. That would be more than enough to-'

“However,” Wei Wuxian continued, “There’s one thing I want in exchange.”

“And what… would that be?” Wen Xu asked.

“I don’t know what the other sect leaders will do once they leave the simulation. That uncertainty…. it worries me. I would rather A-Yuan not be born until I have a better idea of what the future in your world will be.”

Until he could be sure there wouldn’t be an extermination of the Wen.

Until he could be sure someone would be around to help A-Yuan if the boy’s own clan put him at risk.

Wei Wuxian’s motives were clear.

Wen Xu swallowed once, breathing in slowly.

‘What I need right now, more than anything, is power.’

A hostage like Wen Yuan would always be a risky gamble. Many would doubt that Wen Xu could kill his own son and, as far as use went, the only people he could potentially be used on were the watchers of the simulation. A far more promising application of Wen Yuan would be using him as an intermediary between the sects — he was someone many sect leaders would feel they could trust, regardless of his stance as a Wen. However, something like that would take many years to bear fruit. The compass of evil could be put to use right away. If the efficiency of the Wen Sect were to double from what it currently was, the respect of the populace would rise in kind.

Recently, Jin Zixun had been acting out of control more and more frequently. Wen Xu knew Wen Chao had been exchanging letters with him. In trying to stop that, Wen Xu had just made it so that Jin Zixun came over more often — and it wasn’t like Wen Xu could refuse to welcome someone of his rank. The downright terror Wen Chao had shown toward Wei Wuxian was impacting both their actions; all attempts on Wen Xu’s part to change his brother’s mind had proven useless.

If Wen Ruohan was here, he would have managed to put a stop to them. If Wen Ruohan was here, the other sects wouldn’t be moving so far out of line to see what they could get away with. If Wen Ruohan was here, the Wen Sect would be untouchable.

Wen Ruohan wasn’t here. Wen Ruohan had ordered Wen Xu to keep the sect strong. Therefore, Wen Xu had to have a kid.

But, now, a new option showed itself.

(In all honesty, this probably wasn’t a good deal to take. The future’s Wei Wuxian could give those instructions to everyone if he wanted to. The past’s Wei Wuxian could probably reverse engineer it in a day. It wasn’t as sure of a method as Wen Yuan.)

(But, if it meant Wen Xu wouldn’t have to let someone touch him-)

“I agree,” he said at once, the words rushing out before he could really think them through. “I agree. If that’s your only demand… the Wen Sect will accept that offer, Patriarch.”

(The acidic taste that had been forming in his mouth vanished. When the bile disappeared, the worst of his nausea did too.)

“Thank you,” Wen Xu said, bowing slightly.

Wei Wuxian sent a small smile his way.

Within the in-between zone, there was light chatter all around. This was not the tense silence that had occurred in earlier breaks, nor the accusatory hisses and shouts that had previously echoed in the room. Despite that, the current conversations were short and stilted. Every discussion could end at a moment’s notice. Everyone was on edge, waiting for the simulation to begin again.

During this time, Jiang Yanli, sitting next to Wen Qing, tried to smile.

“Your Uncle… seems quite skilled at making wine. From what I understand, A-Xian is very decisive when it comes to alcohol,” she began. “Does he… make any now? I thought our A-Xian might like to try some.”

A small smile formed on Wen Qing’s face as well and she, nodding once, explained, “He does. There’s a grape orchard he maintains near where he and his wife live. I don’t think he’s ever sold any but I’ll… reach out to him. I’m sure we can get some for your… brother.”

Wei Wuxian wasn’t Jiang Yanli’s brother. Not really. But, since the simulation began, Jiang Yanli had used that word to describe him time and time again. Her simulated version had, as well:

‘A-Xian is a disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect. He grew up with my brother and I. Calling him ‘the son of a servant,’ I’m sorry but… I won’t accept this.’

Her other-self had meant it when she said that. Both Jiang Yanlis thought of Wei Wuxian as a brother to them.

Thus, at Wen Qing’s words, Jiang Yanli found herself relaxing a little.

“Thank you for welcoming him,” she said. “I understand how much he did for you, but… the extent you and your family went through to make him feel welcome… thank you. I… appreciate it.”

(Some ways away, out of sight but just close enough to hear them, Madam Yu flinched.)

“Of course.” Wen Qing nodded once. “I’m hoping we’ll never end up in a situation like that in our world, but… my family would welcome him in at any time.”

At those words, Jiang Yanli’s smile faltered just a little.

“Ah,” Wen Qing cleared her throat, having noticed Jiang Yanli’s reaction before even Jiang Yanli did. “I mean… my family would be honored to get to know him. We would welcome him as a friend.”

Wen Qing wouldn’t mind having Wei Wuxian as family. However, if the watchers learned from the simulation and managed to fix their other-selves’ mistakes, such a world would never come to be.

(They were trying to stop the suffering of the future. Inevitably, they would have to stop some of the joy, too.)

“Oh, did I… ah,” Jiang Yanli shook her head. “No. I’m sorry. I’m happy — truly — over what you’ve all done for him. I think it would be wonderful for you all to get to know each other after we leave the simulation. I’m sure you would-”

She cut off, unable to bring herself to say the words “welcome him as one of your own” as things currently were.

(Wei Wuxian had never officially become part of the Jiang family. He wasn’t ‘officially’ part of the Wen remnants either, but they had accepted him in a way the Jiang never did. No matter how much Jiang Yanli had wanted to change things, she was never able to accomplish much, was she?)

As Wen Qing watched Jiang Yanli deflate a little, she felt her own heart sink in turn. They were different in many, many ways, but, at times like this, Jiang Yanli reminded her a bit of Wen Ning.

“I’m not trying to separate your brother from you,” Wen Qing promised (taking extra care to not look at her sect leader, who was almost certainly not included in that). “Jiang-guniang, the situation depicted in the simulation is hardly an inevitability. In fact, that’s exactly what we’re all trying to change. I’m not asking you to give up your brother to us, I just would like to… ah…”

To meet him, get to know him, thank him, and, potentially, provide him with a bit more support than he had with just the Jiang.

(Though it probably wouldn’t help to say that last part out loud.)

“He’s willing to do things few others are for what’s right,” Wen Qing said instead. “Providing him with a few more people he can turn to if he needs help couldn’t hurt.”

“You’re right,” Jiang Yanli agreed. “You’re right.”

Even emotionally, she couldn’t disagree.

(How could she, after watching her side — her to-be in-laws — her brother — leave Wei Wuxian with nowhere else to go?)

Picking up on those thoughts, Wen Qing took a slow breath in, pointing out, “...As Madam Jin said, there’s likely nothing you would be able to do about what happened. I wasn’t able to stop Wen Ruohan from going to war; it makes sense that you couldn't stop this. Even as Jiang Wanyin's sister, there's a limit to what you can do."

"Somehow, that always seems to be true."

Wen Qing paused, not knowing how to respond to that. Jiang Yanli sent her a grateful smile for the attempt but looked away a moment later. Their situations couldn't really be compared. Jiang Yanli was a boring, plain girl without her mother's cultivation, Wen Qing's medical knowledge, or Madam Jin's political influence. She had never wanted to change the world — never needed to be anything more than she was — but, now, she could see first-hand how little that allowed her to do.

If she had been just a bit stronger, maybe she could have fought by Wei Wuxian's side.

If she had been just a bit smarter, maybe she could have convinced the sect leaders to see Wei Wuxian's side.

If she had been just a bit braver, maybe she could have given everything in the Jiang and Jin sects up in order to stand by her brother and do what was right.

(What did it matter? If Jiang Yanli had gone with him, she would have simply been another mouth to feed. How would she have managed to join him anyways? There was no way her guards would just let her walk all the way to Yiling and getting a carriage ride there was just as unlikely. Realistically speaking, everything her other self had tried to do to help probably just hadn't reached him.)

(Because, as the weak, boring, plain Jiang Yanli, she could never do anything to help.)

Jiang Yanli's gaze drifted just a little to the side.

'Zixuan-xiong, who do you think looks the best?'

'Do you even need to ask? He would have to pick his fiancée.'

Jin Zixuan had frowned.

'His fiancée?' another boy asked. 'What sect is she from? She must be extremely talented.'

'Drop it.'

Her fiance hadn't wanted to speak of her. Because, the second people knew who she was:

'Huh? Oh, so it's that plain Jiang Yanli.'

'I suppose she's a bit unsuitable.'

And then-

'Wouldn't it be better to ask what about her I could be satisfied with?!'

Because Wei Wuxian was stuck in the Burial Mounds again. Things were better this time. He was now accompanied by friends. Not just friends, in fact. That whole exchange with A-Yuan on calling him "grandfather," while clearly playful, didn't ring completely false. This time, Wei Wuxian was with people he considered family.

A family not including her.

(Even if she had wanted to go, she wouldn't have had any way of getting there. She couldn't ride on her sword; she simply would have been brought back home before she managed to exit the town. She was never, ever able to do anything to help.)

'Oh, so it's that plain Jiang Yanli.'

Because what else could people view her as?

(Lan Wangji was the only reason Wei Wuxian knew of her marriage.)

"Jiang-guniang," Wen Qing spoke again. "You're not… viewing the situation objectively right now. You don't shoulder most of the blame here — barely any of it can fall to you. There's only so much we can do."

But, though Jiang Yanli smiled at her words, her mood didn't even remotely shift.

Wen Qing had saved Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian right when the war began. She had the influence and power to do so. She had then done everything she could to save her brother from the Jin. In comparison, Jiang Yanli….

Well, there wasn't much to be gained by losing herself in those thoughts right now. Thus:

"Thank you," Jiang Yanli said, trying to make her smile look confident. "I'll keep that in mind. Either way… I'm grateful to you and the rest of your family for so fully accepting him."

"Our brothers…"

"Hm?"

After thinking it over for a moment, Wen Qing continued, "Our brothers are getting to know each other outside the simulation. Your father is there too. As A-Ning gets to know Sect Leader Jiang more and more, he'll feel more comfortable there. I don't know if this will help, but… rather than losing a brother, I hope you can view what's happening in the simulation as gaining another one instead. If not in that world, then in ours."

Jiang Yanli stared back, her eyes going a little wide. Then, when she laughed, her smile was a touch more genuine than it had been before.

"I've never had a sister," she said. "That sounds… fun."

Wen Qing smiled back at her, relaxing as well.

While this was happening, Jiang Yanli's fiance was engaged in a rather different sort of discussion:

"No."

"I bet fifty bronze coins it's a yes."

"I can't believe you're betting on this!"

"Oh, Da-ge, throw in two of my fans into your bet. In exchange, if we're right, Jin-xiong has to give us a new carriage."

"What?! I didn't agree to that!"

"You might as well just give in, Young Master Jin," Lan Xichen advised. "When the two of them are in agreement like this, it's rather hard to convince them of the reverse."

"No need to convince them of the reverse; they're right," Jiang Cheng said, moving away from Jin Zixuan to stand with the Nies. Jin Zixuan gaped.

"We are not betting on whether Wei Wuxian will sneak almond tofu into my wedding for the express purpose of throwing it at me during the ceremony! How would he even do that?!"

"I'm sure he'd find a way," Jiang Cheng asserted.

"Maybe Wangji-xiong would help him sneak it in!" Nie Huaisang suggested.

Everyone swerved toward Lan Wangji who, after a moment's consideration, decided not to deny that possibility.

(Future-him had already fought off Sect Leaders for Wei Wuxian's sake. If it was a favor as minor as sneaking in almond tofu… yes, he definitely would.)

"Okay, let's suppose, hypothetically, that he did manage to get the tofu inside," Jin Zixuan allowed. "Would he really ruin A-Li's special day?! You all might've turned traitor, but surely she'd protect me!"

"I think A-Jie'd be willing to accept it so long as it meant Wei Wuxian could attend her wedding," Jiang Cheng said. Jin Zixuan deflated, unable to deny that.

(What they were discussing was not the wedding within the simulation, which Wei Wuxian had found out about only a few days before. Their debate was instead regarding a marriage in their world, without all the complications of that time. Initially, their focus had been on, generally, things they would do differently than their other selves had. Somehow, they had ended up here.)

(Because the fact that Wei Wuxian wasn't even invited still felt far, far too wrong. In this time before the simulation started again, it was nice to imagine things going right, instead. That said, even with the laughter being spread around, the sect-heirs-plus-Nie-Mingjue still stood rather tense and tightly-wound.)

(Their current feelings would probably not be able to last for long.)

And, as if in proof of that, the world darkened around them a moment later.

Jiang Yanli let out a slow, calming breath.

Jin Ling did the same before, moments later, declaring, "In the following days, with Wen Ning's current state now publicly known, ambitious young cultivators swarmed the Burial Mounds, hoping to be taken in as disciples by the 'patriarch.'"

Said disciple-hopefuls were displayed, kept out of the main part of the mounds by the wall of corpses surrounding it. Nonetheless, they made sure their desires were known. They shouted loudly, held up signs, and even set up paintings of large, hunch-backed, hairy monsters to somehow win the Patriarch's favor.

'No,' Lan Wangji corrected himself. 'Given that description above them…'

The words 'Yiling Patriarch' were written atop most of the paintings. In fact, almost all of them were inscribed with that. One even had 'All Hail the Supreme Lord of Evil, the Patriarch of Yiling.' Somehow or another, these people had gotten the idea that that signified Wei Wuxian.

The room's temperature seemed to drop by ten degrees as Lan Wangji sent them an ice-cold glare. Shivering a little, Jin Zixuan moved away carefully. Lan Qiren gave a short scoff.

"These people… they haven't even seen Wei Wuxian before?"

"Most of these kids are probably people who didn't make it into the big sects," Nie Mingjue pointed out. "All they have to go off are rumors and such."

"Poor A-Xian," Jiang Yanli said, hiding a smile. "He'll be so upset when he finds out."

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes, adding, "Still, you'd think they'd have at least seen him walking around. The people in Yiling certainly laid eyes on him."

Humming thoughtfully, Wen Qing countered, "The war probably built Wei Wuxian's reputation up in the eyes of the public. With what he did to save my family on top of that… even if they do see him, would they recognize him?"

Many of the watchers pursed their lips at that.

(How many of them could truly say they were uninvolved?)

One fierce corpse let out a terrifying roar, sending an interloper flying back. However, being a cultivator, they landed softly and got up again shortly after. The corpse did not follow. Their orders were to keep people out; they weren't trying to hurt them.

Thus, as time went on, more and more people appeared at the base of the Burial Mounds, hoping to be let in.

And wasn't that a sentence that, pre-simulation, the watchers would never have even dreamed of. The Wen Clan, despite all its might, had failed to purify the Burial Mounds. In just a few months, Wei Wuxian had managed to soothe it instead.

'Spiritual energy is energy, but resentment and wrath can become types of energy too. Why can't we make good use of them?' Wei Wuxian had asked, all the way back in the Cloud Recesses. 'When Yu the Great tamed the flood, obstruction was the inferior method and redirection was superior. Suppression is the same as obstruction, so isn't it inferior?'

Wei Wuxian had been actively trying to anger Lan Qiren at that time. Looking back on it now, that fact seemed obvious to the famed instructor. However, that didn't mean Wei Wuxian had said that thoughtlessly.

'Wei Wuxian had no choice but to make demonic cultivation,' Lan Qiren recalled. 'But… even if he'd had other options, what makes this one so wrong?'

(Of course it was wrong. It was disturbing the dead and utilizing negative energy instead of spiritual power. Something like this should only be used if there was no other option. Even the Nie had to hide the kind of cultivation they were doing. It was 'ignoring ethics and morality,' as Lan Qiren's other self had said.)

('....Was it really?' the real one wondered, not daring to answer that himself.)

The Yiling Patriarch himself was shown by the simulation next. He looked left and right, trying to figure out a way to get through his own corpse wall without letting the uninvited guests in. He glared at the sea of visitors, thought for a bit, then frowned.

"Wei Wuxian began to use another path from that point on," Jin Ling explained.

Xue Yang wasn't old enough to have been there, but Nie Huaisang could almost imagine a preteen version standing at the base of the Mounds with the largest 'ALL HAIL THE DARK LORD' sign of all.

When Wei Wuxian appeared next, he was in the streets of Yiling, accompanied by Wen Ning. He ventured through the stalls, gleefully observing the different options and haggling down prices as he saw fit. Every once and a while, he would lean towards Wen Ning and ask the fierce corpse what he thought about one option or another.

Because, no matter what the world said about him, he'd brought Wen Ning back to life to have Wen Ning back, not to create a powerful fierce corpse. Wen Qing smiled lightly.

Wen Ning was carrying enough supplies to nearly be buried under it. There were quite a few people to feed back on the Burial Mounds so the crates of rice and spices piled high.

Despite being a cultivator, Wen Ning had never been able to carry all that much, before. Now, despite the stiffness of his face as an undead corpse…

'He looks happy.' Wen Qing thought, relaxing a little more. 'I'm… glad.'

Strange as it might seem, Wen Ning appeared more relaxed now than he had whenever they had to visit the Nightless City. The Wen Remnants had been isolated to Yiling, but, in many ways, they really had created a home.

Jiang Yanli entwined her fingers together, tensing slightly.

However, at that moment, a flash of purple went by. Wei Wuxian looked over just in time to see Jiang Cheng glance back at him and then go around a corner. Wei Wuxian immediately ran after.

Jiang Cheng's heart skipped a beat.

"Me?" he asked. Many people glanced back and forth between him and the simulation, tense in anticipation. Jiang Cheng sat up straight, nearly on the edge of his seat. His future self was finally there — finally back. All throughout the last segment, he had been wishing his future self was there to help ~~like Lan Wangji~~. However, now, a feeling more akin to dread came over him.

Jiang Cheng's future self had been shown many times; the real version was rarely pleased with what that version did.

Regardless of that, the simulated Jiang Cheng continued walking until he reached a small yard, out of sight of the main street. The moment after Wei Wuxian followed him inside, the gate slammed closed behind him.

"Get out," Jiang Cheng said, having shut the doors before Wen Ning could enter.

Because Wen Ning had rescued him, gotten his parent's ashes, saved Wei Wuxian, and had only come to the Jiang to offer them some help, and yet the future Jiang Cheng felt nothing but hate for anyone with his last name. Just two segments ago, he had tried to tear apart Wen Ning's corpse.

~~Wen Ning had rescued his parents' corpses, then Jiang Cheng tried to destroy his. Was there anything more dishonorable than that?~~

But Jiang Cheng's future self had not spent the last two weeks sitting in the simulation with Wen Qing, watching her grow closer and closer to his sister. Unlike the real one, the simulated one's parents were actually dead. The simulated one was also a sect leader, surrounded by colleagues who cursed the Wens daily for what Wen Ruohan had done.

So, when Wen Qing narrowed her eyes at his simulated-self's actions, all the real Jiang Cheng could do was look away.

And Wen Ning, similarly, didn't try to fight it. Upon realizing that it was Jiang Wanyin blocking him off, he immediately lowered his gaze and left.

However, there was no time to focus on that. For, at that moment, a woman wearing a black cloak and a curtained hat stepped forward. Wei Wuxian's eyes widened.

"Shijie?"

Jiang Yanli stood up, bringing her hands to her mouth to hold back a gasp.

The simulated Jiang Yanli took off her hat and cloak, revealing scarlet robes that shined in the sun. They were decorated with gold, reflecting a brilliant light every time they swayed. When she smiled, the bejeweled crown on her head tinkled with the sound of bells. The flush on her cheeks was enhanced by the makeup she wore, combining into a look that would put an empress to shame.

Jin Zixuan flushed a bright, bright pink.

Wei Wuxian walked over, gaping openly. He looked her up and down, scarcely able to believe his eyes.

"Shijie… you're-"

"What? You think she's marrying you?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"You can shut up."

The casual banter only made Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli smile brighter. The last segment had been a long, stretching length of time spent wondering where their other-selves had been. Why was Wei Wuxian alone? How could they have let Wei Wuxian become so completely cut off from the world in such a short amount of time? How could they have allowed him to be forced into the Burial Mounds again? How could Lan Wangji be the first to tell Wei Wuxian about her wedding?

But they were here. They were here, now. They had finally come!

Jiang Yanli spread out her arms, putting her form on full display, and gave a little spin. She flushed in embarrassment, but her desire to show Wei Wuxian remained firm.

"A-Xian, I'll… be married soon," she revealed. "I came for you to see."

She would indeed be married soon. Given what Lan Wangji said, the wedding was at most a few days away. And yet, despite that, she had still managed to make it out.

~~Wei Wuxian hadn't been forgotten, no matter how the last segment had made them feel.~~

Wei Wuxian smiled and opened his mouth but didn't speak. There seemed like nothing he could say. He stood there for a while longer, still gaping in shock.

Because he had genuinely believed he wouldn't get to see this. That felt wrong — it was wrong — but it was also untrue. He was getting to see. Jiang Yanli had managed to meet with him.

When Madam Jin glanced to the side, she saw Jiang Yanli's eyes starting to water again. The young woman was just as speechless as Wei Wuxian, watching the simulation with wide eyes. Jin Zixuan hadn't really taken his eyes off the simulated Jiang Yanli since she arrived, but even he would glance out of the corner of his eyes at Wei Wuxian every once in a while. This scene as a whole — the fact that Jiang Yanli was getting to show this to Wei Wuxian — seemed to be worth more to him than any present he had ever received. In a different time, both he and Madam Jin had thought Wei Wuxian might be interested in Jiang Yanli in a romantic way:

'What? Am I wrong? If you like her so much, why don't you talk to her father? If you want her, I don't think he'd object. Doesn't he treat you better than his own child or something?'

He had been wrong on both accounts, there. And more so:

'A-Xian is a disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect. He grew up with my brother and I. Calling him 'the son of a servant,' I'm sorry, but… I won't accept this.'

She had faced Jin Zixun down.

'Madam, A-Xian is my younger brother. To me, him being humiliated by others isn't a small matter.'

Now, at long last, both Jin Zixuan and Madam Jin understood what Jiang Yanli had meant. As she looked over this scene, Madam Jin simply saw her to-be daughter in law speaking to her brothers. Wei Wuxian was part of Jiang Yanli's family.

"I…" Wei Wuxian trailed off. "I know. I'd heard-"

"Who did you hear about this from?"

"That's none of your business," Wei Wuxian responded, not even looking at Jiang Cheng while he spoke. His eyes remained fixated on Jiang Yanli.

The real Jiang Cheng squirmed, disliking the reminder of how isolated Wei Wuxian was — of how the future Jiang Cheng knew how isolated Wei Wuxian was — and how much his future self's words may have contributed to that.

(At the very least, Wei Wuxian didn't seem to be receiving communications of any kind from Jiang Cheng. If there wasn't even that, receiving supplies or resources was an even further possibility.)

(But, now that they'd finally reunited, that might change.)

"Ah, but…" Jiang Yanli flushed a little more, lowering her arms and closing in on herself in embarrassment. "I'm the only one who's here. You won't be able to see the groom."

Jin Zixuan jolted, making his seat scrape across the ground.

Did that mean that he had refused to come? Or, considering the role his family had played in Wei Wuxian's situation, had Jiang Yanli not been willing to ask?

After pausing for a long moment, Wei Wuxian shrugged, pointing out, "It's not like I care about looking at some groom."

‘Well, he’s at the very least quite good at pretending not to care,’ Wen Ruohan supposed.

Stepping closer, Wei Wuxian circled Jiang Yanli a few times, eyeing her from every angle. The jewels she wore sparkled in the sun, directing every gaze her way. As Wei Wuxian finished his last circle, he nodded in satisfaction.

Jin Zixuan nodded rapidly in agreement.

“It doesn’t count if you two are the ones saying that. I can’t take you seriously!” Jiang Yanli protested.

Jiang Cheng sighed: “You don’t believe me and you don’t believe him. Is it that you’ll only believe it when a certain somebody says so?”

“It’s good!” Jin Zixuan immediately shouted. Upon hearing that, the real Jiang Yanli’s face turned just as red as her counterpart’s had.

She quickly changed the subject, requesting, “A-Xian… give a courtesy name.”

“What courtesy name?”

Jiang Cheng grinned, answering, “A courtesy name for my unborn nephew.”

Both Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan flushed an even deeper red than before at that implication. Madam Yu, on the other hand, grew a little quiet. Like Madam Jin, she had felt Wei Wuxian’s status as Jiang Yanli’s ‘brother’ grow more and more obvious as the simulation went on.

‘It doesn’t count if you two are the ones saying that!’ Jiang Yanli had protested.

Because both of them were family to her, so their compliments could only mean so much.

And yet, because Wei Wuxian had never been officially adopted into the Jiang family, Jiang Cheng’s description of Jin Ling was “my” unborn nephew, not “ours.”

Madam Yu couldn’t say with absolute certainty what Jiang Fengmian would have done if she hadn’t been around, but, at the very least, the chances of things being different seemed high. If she had just…

Well, it was a bit late for regrets now.

However, Wei Wuxian seemed to pay no mind to the implication nor the use of “my.” He closed his eyes for a moment, thinking carefully. Then, grinning, he seemed to come to a conclusion.

“The next generation of the LanlingJin Sect will use the name “Ru,” right? How about Jin Rulan?”

Nie Huaisang snorted. Jin Zixuan coughed out a laugh. No matter what his brother might have said, Lan Wangji did not squeak at those words. Jiang Yanli, on the other hand, just smiled warmly.

'Right,' she nodded at herself. 'I can't help A-Xian much right now. I can't convince the sects or fight alongside A-Xian. If so… I'm so happy I was able to do this.'

Jin Rulan. So that was A-Ling's courtesy name. It suited him.

"That's great!" her other-self agreed at once.

Jiang Cheng disapproved, snapping, "No. It sounds like Jin Rulan, Lan being from the Lan Sect. Why would a descendant of the LanlingJin and YunmengJiang Sect have a name like that?"

Though no one said anything out loud, everyone's eyes turned toward Lan Wangji as soon as that question was asked. His ears immediately turned pink.

"It's not like there's anything wrong with the Lan Sect, is there? The Lan flower is the gentleman of flowers; the Lan Sect is made up of the most gentlemanly of people. It's a good name."

"That's not what you said in the past," Jiang Cheng pointed out.

"I'm the one giving the name, not you! Why are you being so picky?"

"That's enough," Jiang Yanli said. "You know how A-Cheng is. He's the one who came up with the idea of having you give the courtesy name."

"I did?" Jiang Cheng asked. A moment later, Jiang Yanli turned to him with sparkling eyes.

"Good job, A-Cheng," she praised. "That was a wonderful idea!"

Jin Zixuan nodded in agreement, Nie Mingjue gave a little acknowledging tilt of his head, and even Madam Yu's shock seemed to bleed into approval for a brief moment. Jiang Cheng grinned.

(Wei Wuxian had been surviving without help for a few months now. However, if it was true that his other-self had suggested this, maybe that was going to change.)

"Both of you stop fooling around, now. I brought soup for you two. Wait a second."

Having said that, Jiang Yanli departed toward the house. Watching her, Wei Wuxian licked his lips, mouth salivating a little as he imagined the taste.

(He hadn't eaten good food in quite some time, after all.)

Jiang Cheng nudged him, silently mocking his reaction. Wei Wuxian shoved him back and, for a moment, it seemed like they were fifteen year olds in the Cloud Recesses again.

In that instant, it really seemed like nothing had changed. If the war with the Wens had never happened — if the Wen remnants had never needed help — this same conversation may have still occurred. Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian would snap back and forth to each other, praising Jiang Yanli with every other breath. It felt natural; normal.

And yet, right now, Jiang Yanli was dressed head to toe in the most splendid outfit she had ever worn. A single jewel sewn into it could probably buy a moderately-sized house. Jiang Cheng, similarly, was dressed with the splendor his position as Sect Leader deserved. The bold, deep-purple fabric and silver headpiece made it clear he was not someone who could be ignored. On the other hand, despite his even greater infamy and reputation, Wei Wuxian's robes were thin and blackened. They weren't low quality — they were the same ones he had worn while in the Jiang Sect — but the issue came from the fact that they were the exact same ones. Months had passed, and Wei Wuxian had continued to wear those same robes. After all, they were fairly high quality; if they had the money for new robes, it was better to use it to replace the thin prison robes the Wens wore.

Now, despite the careful, stream-based maintenance and cleaning Wei Wuxian had given them, even the red parts of his robes had become black all the way through. In the condition they were in now, he probably wouldn't even be able to sell them for cash. It was… a rather stark contrast when they all stood side by side.

Jiang Yanli returned from the kitchens soon enough, coming back to find Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng standing next to each other. She handed them each a bowl, then returned to the kitchens once more. She came back with a third bowl, walking just outside the gate to Wen Ning to hand it to him.

"I'm sorry, there are only small bowls left. Here, you can have this," she offered.

Wen Ning, who had been standing guard by the door, jumped a little, asking, "Th-there's some for me?"

Wen Qing's eyes watered momentarily. She closed them for a moment and breathed in, suddenly feeling overwhelmed. No matter the form her brother was in, that really was Wen Ning.

"Thank you," she muttered.

"Of course," Jiang Yanli nodded.

However, Jiang Cheng wasn't pleased:

"Why does he get some too?" the sect leader asked.

Jiang Cheng had been unconscious for most of the time Wen Ning was helping him. Perhaps, as a result, he couldn't let go of his feelings so easily.

'Well, what room do I have to talk?' Nie Mingjue wondered. 'As soon as Jiang Wanyin mentioned that he owed Wen Qionglin and Wen Qing I demanded an explanation. Their surname was Wen, so they had to be grouped in with all the others in my mind.'

In some ways, his hatred had been the turning point of that discussion. If Nie Mingjue was in Jiang Cheng's position now, could he really be sure he wouldn't react in the same way?

Meanwhile, unbothered by her brother's question, Jiang Yanli simply answered, "I brought so much anyways. If he's here, he should get some."

"...Thank you, Maidan Jiang," Wen Ning said, hesitantly. "Thank you."

'Rather than losing a brother, think of it as gaining one?' Jiang Yanli repeated in her mind. 'I... would like if that could be the case.'

'But…' Wen Ning continued internally, 'I… can't drink it.'

"Huh?"

'I'm a fierce corpse. The dead can neither eat nor drink.' Wen Ning frowned. 'It's just a waste to give me some.'

"Oh," Jiang Yanli said, blushing once more. "Ah, my mistake."

Best of intentions, as per usual. However, in regards to whether she actually improved situations…

But, although she didn't understand why, the simulated Jiang Yanli could tell that Wen Ning was feeling awkward. She immediately began talking to him, asking about the people in the Burial Mounds and his opinions on this and that. Little by little, the fierce corpse began to relax.

"Jiang-guniang," Wen Qing said. "...No matter what, nothing could help more than you continuing to treat him like a human. Thank you for this."

"Huh?" Jiang Yanli blinked. "Oh. I… of course, Wen-guniang. I'm… glad I could help."

It was hard to say where the point was that 'good intentions' stopped being good enough. However, for now, they didn't seem to have reached there yet.

Standing a little ways away, Jiang Cheng raised his bowl and toasted, "To the Yiling Patriarch."

"Shut up!" Wei Wuxian shouted back, immediately recalling the signs of 'All Hail the Supreme Lord of Evil, the Patriarch of Yiling.'

Jiang Cheng drank a mouthful of the broth then asked, "How's your wound from last time?"

The real Jiang Cheng's eyes went down at that, the area to Wei Wuxian's side attracting his gaze.

"It healed a long time ago," Wei Wuxian said.

“Mn,” Jiang Cheng continued. “...In how many days?”

Because it didn’t matter that, for a moment, Jiang Cheng’s hatred had been directed toward Wei Wuxian too. He still cared about his shixiong. At this point in time, there was still concern.

‘So then,’ Wen Ruohan wondered. ‘When does that change?’

“Less than seven,” Wei Wuxian responded. “I told you before. With Wen Qing, it was nothing difficult. But you really did fucking stab me!”

“You smashed my arm first!” Jiang Cheng pointed out, eating a lotus root. “You took seven days, while I had to put my arm in a sling for an entire month!”

Wei Wuxian grinned, explaining, “It wouldn’t be realistic if it wasn’t hard enough! I attacked your left hand anyways so you wouldn’t be hindered from writing. It can take a hundred days to heal a wound to the bone; you should be happy it didn’t take three months!”

Once again, Nie Huaisang lowered his gaze to Wei Wuxian’s side. The Yiling Patriarch had been stabbed in the gut. It was true that, with a powerful core and the supervision of the world’s greatest doctor, a wound like that could be healed in seven days. But…

‘Can the same be said if that injury is sustained without a core?’

Nie Huaisang honestly didn’t know. He rarely got injured himself and never going on night hunts meant he had little experience with other people getting injuries. Still, Wei Wuxian’s time estimate seemed worthy of suspicion, if nothing else.

(Lan Wangji, standing a little to the side, noticed how Nie Huaisang’s gaze remained focused there. He glanced over as well, thinking carefully.)

Outside, they could hear Wen Ning answering Jiang Yanli with the same stutters he had before. It seemed, when overwhelmed, his nervousness would defeat the slow rate at which a fierce corpse would talk. Both Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng were quiet for a bit, listening absently. Then:

“You’re really staying like this from now on?” Jiang Cheng asked. “Do you have any plans?”

Wei Wuxian shook his head, explaining, “Not at the moment. None of the Wen Remnants dare go down the mountain right now. People don’t dare to do anything to me when I go down the mountain, though. It’ll be fine so long as I don’t stir up trouble on my own.”

“On your own?” Jiang Cheng sneered. “Wei Wuxian, do you believe that even if you don’t stir up trouble on your own, trouble won’t come and find you? It’s often impossible to save someone, but there are more than thousands of ways to harm someone.”

Wei Wuxian continued to eat, responding, "A man with strength can kill ten with skill. I don't care if they have thousands of ways. I'll kill anyone who comes."

Jiang Cheng scoffed, muttering, "You never listen to any of my opinions. One day, you'll understand who's right."

With every word spoken, Madam Yu tensed, feeling that specific phrasing generate memories she would rather ignore.

After the Xuanwu of Slaughter, when Wei Wuxian had opposed the Wens to save Jin Zixuan, Lan Wangji, and MianMian, Madam Yu had scoffed and growled, 'To uphold justice at all costs is exactly how he is, isn't it? Fooling around even though he knew it would bring trouble to the sect!'

'To uphold justice,' she had said. Like most of the sect leaders after Wei Wuxian took in the Wens, she had known he was in the right. Despite that, she had described it as 'fooling around.'

Then:

'Why? Why? Why?!' Jiang Cheng had cried, choking Wei Wuxian with all his might. 'Why did you save Lan Wangji? Why did you have to speak up?! How many times have I told you not to stir up trouble?! Not to strike?! Do you want to play the hero that badly? Well, have you seen the result of you playing hero? Are you happy now?!'

Everyone, everywhere, always and without fail seemed to be telling Wei Wuxian that it was wrong to do what was right.

'It'll be fine so long as I don't stir up trouble on my own,' Wei Wuxian said.

What, exactly, did Wei Wuxian mean by 'stir up trouble?' How did he interpret that assertion he'd made? What had Madam Yu taught him about those words over time?

'Let the self judge right and wrong; allow others to direct praise or blame; let gains and losses remain uncommented on. I don't care what others say. I know what I should do. I believe I'll be able to control it.'

How could it be a surprise that Wei Wuxian never listened to Jiang Cheng's opinions? Over the years, Madam Yu had taught him to only trust himself.

Wei Wuxian finished the soup in one gulp and stood up.

"Wow, I'm impressed. Round of applause for the Yiling Patriarch," Jiang Cheng said. The words were of the same teasing nature as before, but his tone had gone hard and cold.

"Are you done yet?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Jiang Cheng stood, adding, "We won't see you off. It wouldn't be good if someone saw us together."

Because Wei Wuxian was now an enemy of the sects.

Because Jiang Cheng had told the world as much.

Wei Wuxian nodded once.

More generally than the enemy issue, no one would believe that Wei Wuxian had defected from the sect if people saw them together. It was indeed wise to not let such rumors spread.

"We'll go first," he said.

Jiang Cheng nodded, watching him leave.

"...That's all?" Jiang Yanli asked, her voice shaking a little. Sure, she knew how difficult it was for her and Jiang Cheng to see him, but, still, she had thought this would last a little longer. Jiang Cheng scowled.

Now, at long last, the future Jiang Cheng had done something the real one didn't hate. Wei Wuxian getting to see Jiang Yanli and getting to pick Jin Ling's courtesy name was something the real Jiang Cheng wholeheartedly supported. It was just…

Was this… it?

'He's really leaving? You're just going to let Wei Wuxian leave?' Jiang Cheng wondered. 'You haven't been in contact in months. They're growing radishes on the Burial Mounds! You got him a couple bowls of soup — one of which was for someone who can't eat — and now you're just going to let him go?'

The future Lan Wangji had gotten a meal for Wei Wuxian and A-Yuan and, on top of that, had gotten A-Yuan a few toys. He had gone back to the Burial Mounds, greeted the Wens, and helped save them from the Ghost General's rampage. That wasn't very much — the real Lan Wangji clearly wished his other self had done more — but that was still leagues beyond what Jiang Cheng had apparently done.

~~Was it any surprise that, after being brought back to life, Wei Wuxian would always choose Lan Wangji over him?~~

'Why can't you give more?' Jiang Cheng wondered. 'Food, supplies, medicine, information? Is one bowl of soup really all you can do?'

However, even while asking that, Jiang Cheng knew it was a futile request. The future Jiang Cheng cared about Wei Wuxian. He worried about Wei Wuxian. It was to the point that, when he saw the Wens searching for remnants of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect after the fall of Lotus Pier, he had run out as a distraction to keep them from finding Wei Wuxian.

He had been caught.

And then…

'Wei Wuxian, do you know why Wen Zhuliu is called the Core Melting Hand?'

He had already lost his family and his sect. With his core gone, Jiang Cheng felt like he had lost everything.

'An average person who descended from the cultivation world is no better than a good-for-nothing.'

Helping Wei Wuxian had hurt him. Wei Wuxian helping others had hurt the Jiang Sect. Jiang Cheng had cared about Wei Wuxian — still cared about Wei Wuxian — but, in the end, wasn't willing to do more than this. His sect, his family… those were his priorities. Wei Wuxian fell by the wayside toward that end.

They parted ways. Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning left first, heading down an alleyway by themselves. After a bit of walking, Wei Wuxian looked back toward Wen Ning again.

"Why are you still holding that soup?"

Wen Ning jumped a little, then, reluctantly, responded, "To… take it back. I can't drink it, but I can give it to someone else."

"...That's your choice," Wei Wuxian supposed. "Be careful not to spill it."

He looked forward again.

'It'll probably… be a long time before I can see people I'm familiar with again,' he thought. 'But then again… aren't I on the way to see people I'm familiar with as well?'

Someone sucked in a breath of air. For a moment, Jiang Yanli became unnaturally still.

Wei Wuxian looked up, his back becoming a little straighter as he continued the journey home.

Such a happy moment really shouldn't hurt so much to see.

The world turned dark.

Then, the scene changed. The dirty, damaged streets of Yiling were no more. Now, priceless treasures, books, and scrolls lined walls that stretched as far as the eye could see. The hall was well-lit, weapons and jewels sparkling in golden light as the sun shone down from above.

"Inside the largest Treasure Pavillion in Lanling," Jin Ling announced, sounding almost bored.

A stark, stark contrast to the streets of before.

It wasn't like the people gathered here were unaware of the world's inequality. It was obvious, even among cultivators. Sects that did well would, of course, have more wealth and power than ones that did poorly. They were clearly better at protecting the populace, so giving them more resources was both logical and inevitable, given that the common folk also wanted to be protected by the best. Luck was also a factor; some places were just less fortunate than others.

But who in their right mind would describe people in the Burial Mounds as simply "less fortunate?"

(And who would be able to deny the very direct ways the sects had taken the wealth of the Wens before sending the people into labor camps to slave away?)

Inside the hall, many cultivators were gathered, all clamoring about and observing the treasures on display. They seemed to view it as a hall of wonders, eyeing the goods with equal parts awe and envy. As they all walked through, some began to talk:

"Chief Cultivator?" one asked. "It seems like the big sects have been arguing about whether they'll continue that position for a while. Have they come to a conclusion yet?"

"What is there to argue about? We can't be a heap of loose sand, a group without a leader, forever, right? To set a cultivator to watch over all the sects, I don't see anything wrong with that."

"It's not that good, is it? Just look at what happened with the Qishan Wen Sect."

With the previous Chief Cultivator being who he was, it was inevitable that questions about continuing the tradition would arise. It had, most recently, been Wen Ruohan. Next, it was probably Jin Guangshan. In the future, Jin Guangyao ended up with the position.

Not the most encouraging track record.

"It'll be different now. We're deciding it through an election this time. It's different; it's different."

"Hah. They say it's an election, but everyone knows the truth in their hearts. No matter what, the only options are in that same, small group of people, right? Is there any room for anyone else?"

"Chifeng-zun is also quite against it, isn't he? He's tried to stop Jin Guangshan so, so many times."

Neither Nie Mingjue nor Jin Guangshan looked at the other, but their awareness focused on the other's presence all the same. With their respective positions, it was somewhat inevitable for disagreements to pop up every now and again. However:

'Although the LanlingJin Sect was determined to protect Xue Yang, Xiao Xingchen didn't waver either. As the stalemate continued, they finally startled Nie Mingjue, Chifeng-zun. Having not intended to participate in the Discussion Conference, he was forced to hurry over from far away. Despite Nie Mingjue being a junior to Jin Guangshan, he conducted himself in a strict manner and refused to tolerate Xue Yang no matter what. After an angry lecture, Jin Guangshan was left with no words and a great deal of embarrassment.'

Because, for all that everyone felt free to ignore Wei Wuxian, no one could push Sect Leader Nie's words aside.

'Nie Mingjue, being the irritable person he was, unsheathed his saber on the spot intending to kill Xue Yang. Even when Lianfeng-zun, his sworn brother Jin Guangyao, attempted to ease the situation, he just ordered him to leave. After a harsh scolding, Jin Guangyao just hid behind Lan Xichen, not daring to say anything else.

'LanlingJin was indeed the sect with the thickest face. Although, in Koi Tower, it promised all the sects that Xue Yang would be executed, when it left Nie Mingjue's sight it immediately changed execution to life imprisonment. Hearing about Lanling's decision, Nie Mingjue was enraged and pressured them again.

'...But, shortly afterward, Nie Mingjue passed away from a qi deviation.'

And that was that.

(Sure, Jin Guangyao had been personally motivated by what Nie Mingjue had said to him. However, it was hard to say the Xue Yang issue played no part. That was one of the things that had made Nie Mingjue so mad at Jin Guangyao, after all. It was also a way LanlingJin would benefit from his death.)

Both Nie Mingjue and Jin Guangshan continued to watch each other out of the corners of their eyes, wondering how long the amicability between their sects would last once they returned to the real world.

Meanwhile, the two cultivators had continued to speak:

"Anyways, they'll probably continue mulling over it for a long time."

"Whatever. It's the worries of those who sit at the top. None of our business. Shrimps like us have no control over this regardless of how much we want to."

It was a rather strange conversation to listen to. Not in general, but rather for the specific group of people who had been gathered here — all of whom were selected for the influence they held in the cultivation world. They had the power to make exactly the changes being discussed right now. So: what should they do?

'There's no harm in doing this same thing, right?' Jin Guangshan thought. 'Chief Cultivators are useful to have around. Makes the meetings much more organized. If Wen Ruohan steps down from his position, there's no reason to not continue it. If I was Chief Cultivator…'

Though, to make that happen, Jin Guangshan would have to convince the other sect leaders first. After a brief pause, he sighed.

Within the simulation, having demoralized themselves at the reminder of their own insignificance, the gathered cultivators then changed the subject, one asking, "Did any of you attend the completion ceremony of the Cloud Recesses' Library Pavillion? Well, I went. I stood there and looked; it was identical to how it was before. A difficult undertaking, indeed."

Lan Xichen, Lan Qiren, and Lan Wangji had to resist the urge to object. Certainly, to people who had only ever briefly seen the Library Pavillion, the end result would be a close enough match. However, to people who had grown up in the Cloud Recesses their whole lives…

They could still remember how confused they had been when the simulation had first shown the future one. Everything had been shifted just a little, clearly trying to resemble how it used to be, but being minutely different nonetheless. The Wens, as they later learned, had burned their version down.

They glanced back, their eyes landing on Wen Ruohan once more.

Meanwhile, the other cultivators had pounced on the conversation change, agreeing, "Yeah, very difficult. It was such a huge cultivational residence, an ethereal realm that was a hundred years old — how could it be rebuilt in such a short amount of time?"

"Speaking of which, there have been a lot of joyous occasions these days, haven't there?"

Like Jiang Yanli's wedding, which Wei Wuxian hadn't even known about — much less been invited to — until a few days before?

'I'm glad… I got to show A-Xian my dress,' Jiang Yanli thought. 'I just wish…'

Wei Wuxian had been one of the main reasons their side won the war. If anyone should get to participate in these 'joyous occasions,' it should be him.

An idea only made more prominent when another cultivator asked, "Ah, you mean like the one-month celebration for Jin Zixuan's son?"

"A-Ling?" Jiang Yanli asked, her eyes going wide.

"You know, that kid… there was a whole pile of colorful things, but he didn't like any of them. Cried so hard that the roof of the Glamor Hall was almost screamed off!"

The two parents blushed, not sure how to respond to the gossip being spread around.

"But then, as soon as he saw his dad's Suihua, he started giggling instead. His parents were so happy. They all agreed he's going to be a wonderful swordsman when he grows up."

The pair's embarrassment quickly turned into pride, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan turning toward each other with sparkling eyes.

At that moment, someone in white robes passed by. Their features were hidden in the shadows, but the jade pendant in their hand shined in the sunlight. Hearing the conversation between the cultivators, he smiled. Then:

“Ah, Madam Jin is so lucky,” a female cultivator said. “She must have given up on immortality in her last life to have such good fortune in this one.”

“Yeah, looks like it’s true that it doesn’t matter how talented you are. You’ll be fine so long as you have a good background. She’s clearly average at best.”

It took Jiang Yanli a long moment to realize that ‘Madam Jin’ now referred to her. However, even then, her smile didn’t falter. She had heard things like this many times before ~~and couldn’t disagree.~~

To her sides, her brother, mother, and fiance all growled.

And the person in white frowned as well.

By contrast, Nie Mingjue furrowed his brows thoughtfully.

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, despite their initial arranged marriage, had eventually gotten married for love. Leaving that aside, Jiang Yanli had many admirable traits that were not cultivation. The womans’ words were not fair.

But, as Nie Mingjue couldn’t help but recall, the statement ‘you’ll be fine so long as you have a good background’ wasn’t entirely false.

Then, another ways away:

“The Lanling Jin Sect really does deserve its reputation! Even a baby that’s only been born a little while ago gets such a grand display!”

“Of course. Don’t you know who that baby’s parents are? It’s not that the young Madam Jin refuses to let it be simple. Her mother in law and her younger brother… if it was a humble celebration, would either of those two accept that?”

Jiang Cheng shook his head fiercely.

“Speaking of which, have you heard? In regards to the child’s one-month celebration… a certain someone has been invited?”

“Hm?” Nie Huaisang tilted his head.

“Who?” the cultivator asked.

“Wei Wuxian!”

“Eh?”

“Huh?”

“What?”

“A-Xian?!”

There was a momentary silence within the Treasure Pavillion.

“Really?” someone said at last. “I… thought that was only a rumor. Was he really invited?!”

Jiang Yanli and Jiang Cheng leaned forward in their seats, wondering the same.

“He was! It’s been confirmed in the past few days. Wei Wuxian is invited!”

Something that, most certainly, couldn’t have been easy. Jiang Yanli hadn’t managed to invite him to her wedding, but she had managed this. Overwhelmed, Jiang Yanli gasped a little, bringing her hands to her mouth and choking back a sob that wanted to come out.

She had done it. Wei Wuxian hadn’t been forgotten at all. Sure, the wedding dress had indicated that a little but it had been… lacking, in some ways. Not as much help as Jiang Yanli would have liked to give.

But, if everyone in the Great Sects saw Wei Wuxian now — if they could all recall who, exactly, he was — then maybe things could be fixed! To have something like this be official, someone else’s approval would have been needed.

Jiang Yanli looked over to her fiance, her eyes sparkling with joy.

“Thank you, A-Xuan,” she said.

“I… uh, yeah! Of course! He’s your brother; it only makes sense for him to be able to come.”

Despite that confident assertion, the people within the simulation reacted with significantly less joy:

“Just what is the LanlingJin Sect thinking?” one asked. “Have they forgotten about the number of innocent people Wei Wuxian murdered on Qiongqi path?”

“All zero of them, you mean?” Wen Qing snapped.

“Who would dare go to Jin Ling’s celebration knowing that someone like him has been invited? Anyways, I definitely won’t go no matter what!”

The person in white hesitated a little longer. Then, at last, he walked away, slipping into an alley. A black cloaked figure appeared.

“Are you done with your purchase, Young Master?” the fierce corpse asked.

The now-revealed Wei Wuxian threw the box in his hands over in response.

Lan Wangji frowned minutely, the motion so slight that even Lan Xichen couldn’t see.

‘Wei Ying hears those things about himself all the time, doesn’t he?’ the second jade thought. ‘He can’t argue against it or protest. He can’t say anything in response. No one would believe him if he did.’

Truly, Lan Wangji hated politics.

However, both Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning had long-since accepted this fact. They were focused on the box, instead. Wen Ning opened it, the delicate sandalwood giving way to display a piece of jade attached to a tassel. Light flowed through the translucent pendant, almost coming alive inside the stone.

"It's so pretty," Wen Ning said.

"This pretty little thing wasn't cheap at all. Your sister's money almost wasn't enough after we went and bought this new outfit," Wei Wuxian declared. "I don't have a single coin left. I'm in for the scolding of a lifetime when we get back."

Jin Zixuan shifted, the golden headpiece he wore feeling strangely heavy, now.

"No, no. Young Master is buying a gift for Jiang-guniang's child. Jiejie won't scold you!" Wen Ning insisted.

"Mark your words. When Wen Qing does scold me, remember to help me out a bit."

A small smile formed on Wen Qing's face. She wanted to roll her eyes at Wei Wuxian's ridiculous words, but, at that moment, couldn't quite bring herself to do it.

Meanwhile, unable to resist, Jiang Yanli walked closer, observing the pendant directly.

"That pendant…" she began. "It's for A-Ling?"

"Good." Jiang Cheng nodded in approval. "If he showed up to the one-month celebration without anything to offer, I would've kicked him right out!"

"Interesting choice in present," Nie Mingjue commented. Despite his even tone, he was sitting rather stiff, tapping his finger against the armrest of his chair. A mix of tentative hope and nervous anticipation filled him.

(This was good. Wei Wuxian was going to see all of them. He had been invited, brought a present, and was there with good intentions. If he wanted any hope of turning his reputation around, something like this would be a good start.)

(Of course, if this had succeeded, the far-future would have never come to be. As Wei Wuxian walked down the road to the LanlingJin Sect, several watchers couldn't help but recall how things had turned out for him the last time he was there.)

(Hopefully this visit wouldn't end with Suihua sticking through his gut.)

Uncaring of the worries of humans, several birds flew by overhead. Wei Wuxian glanced up at them, observing their pure white feathers with a soft look of nostalgia. In the Burial Mounds, the only other living creatures were the pitch-black crows.

Although Wen Ning's body couldn't smile quite like it used to, happiness did seem apparent in his expression as he declared, "Young Master Jin Ling will definitely like this a lot."

"Huh? No, no, this, in itself, isn't the present. It's only a small accessory. Just look at those gifts in the Treasure Pavillion — do they have anything but how they look?"

"Then, Young Master, what will your gift be?"

A somber look crossed Wei Wuxian's face and he declared, "The will of the Heavens shall not be grasped by mere mortals."

"Oh," Wen Ning said, his questions coming to a stop.

A few seconds passed without conversation between them. Finally:

"Wen Ning, shouldn't you keep on asking? How could you stop after just an 'Oh?' Don't you want to know what the present is?!" Wei Wuxian protested.

There was a near-collective wave of facepalms and eyerolls at those words. Wen Qing huffed a short laugh, but felt her smile only widen.

And, at last, Wen Ning registered what Wei Wuxian was actually trying to say: "I do! I do, Young Master. What gift did you prepare?"

Wei Wuxian took out a small wooden box from his sleeve, handing it over. Wen Ning took off the lid.

A shining, silver bell laid in the center.

Wen Ning's hands trembled a little.

The design of the bell was certainly intricate. It was clear that an expert craftsman had spent a long time working on it, the nine-petaled lotus inside both delicate and grand. However, more than that…

"It feels tingly," Nie Huaisang observed, leaning in close.

Not how most of the watchers would have described the experience, but not inaccurate.

"There's… quite a lot of power resting in there," Jin Guangshan muttered. Wen Ruohan walked around Wei Wuxian, leaning in to observe the bell more closely.

It seemed to give off an immense power.

"Young Master, is this what you've been working on for the past month or so?" Wen Ning asked. "When you'd shut yourself into the cave for days on end?"

"That's right," Wei Wuxian confirmed. "As long as that nephew of mine carries this bell around, not a single low-level creature will be able to even think about getting close to him! Don't touch it. It'll probably leave you affected for some time if you do."

Wen Ning nodded, commenting, "I can feel it."

Even the Ghost General, the strongest fierce corpse in existence, could be affected. If true, this single bell could be considered a treasure more valuable than a thousand priceless jewels.

"...Wow," Jin Zixuan muttered. "That's…"

He didn't even have the words.

"A-Xian," Jiang Yanli gasped.

However-

"Wow, I wonder if the future's Jin Ling was ever told about this," Nie Huaisang commented. Many of the watchers winced.

Jin Ling stabbed Suihua through Wei Wuxian's gut. The look of complete surprise the dreaded Yiling Patriarch had in that moment was impossible to forget.

"...No," Lan Wangji said at last. "That seems unlikely."

No one in the future would ever consider saying something positive about Wei Wuxian. It would be no surprise, then, if Jin Ling didn't know where this present of his came from. Even if he asked, who would tell?

Wei Wuxian then took the tassel, slipping it through the hook on the top of the silver bell. Assembled together, it was quite a pleasant sight. A wonderful present, even without considering the power it held.

Jiang Yanli smiled once more.

'A-Xian and Wen Ning-gongzi get along quite well,' she thought. 'I'm glad. I should make something for both of them, sometime. It seems likely that Wen-gongzi will be coming around often, with how the real versions are getting along outside.'

Wen Ning then continued, "But… since you'll be attending Jin Ling-gongzi's one-month celebration… Young Master, you have to hold yourself back when you see Maiden Jiang's husband. Don't clash with him-"

"Relax, relax," Wei Wuxian said. "I know what I should and shouldn't do. Since Jin Zixuan invited me, I won't badmouth him for a whole year!"

A sentiment which, to all the watchers there, felt genuine. Despite the numerous conflicts they'd had before, Wei Wuxian was willing to put all that aside for today. Jin Zixuan, similarly, seemed to be extending an olive branch by allowing Wei Wuxian to come. A mutual extension of good will was in place.

'This is… going too well, isn't it?' Wen Ruohan thought.

Shifting awkwardly, Wen Ning scratched his head and admitted, "When Young Master Jin's people presented you with an invitation at the bottom of the Burial Mounds, I thought it had to be a trap. I'd misunderstood. I wasn't being fair to him. I couldn't tell before but, in reality, Young Master Jin is a nice person."

The two of them continued walking, turning onto Qiongqi path.

Jin Zixuan was lightly flushed, a bit overwhelmed by the compliments (and caught off guard by the revelation that the invitation had been given by him). Jiang Yanli smiled at his reaction and, to the side, Madam Yu gave an unusually fond huff.

'It's about time Wei Wuxian came around to that,' she thought. 'Really, I thought that boy would never learn to tolerate A-Xuan. Wen Ning seems to be helping him adjust to that, too.'

Wei Wuxian hadn't been able to come to Jiang Yanli's wedding, but at least he was here for this.

Wen Ning and Wei Wuxian walked and walked and walked. The sun was high in the sky; there were birds fluttering this way and that; the air was crisp and clear. And yet, despite the animals moving about in the nearby forest…

'It's… strangely quiet,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Where are all the people?'

At those words, both Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen felt their nerves freeze up. Sect Leader Nie began bouncing his leg up and down while Lan Xichen's fingers entwined and re-entwined like mad.

Wei Wuxian came to a stop.

"Has something happened near here?" he wondered. Wen Ning straightened up, his eyes going completely white. The resentful energy within him shifted, becoming far more aggressive than before.

"It's so quiet," the Ghost General observed.

"It really is a bit too quiet," Wei Wuxian agreed.

Nie Huaisang gulped.

'I can't even hear the cries of resentful spirits anymore,' Wei Wuxian observed.

Something he should be able to hear all the time.

Although she tried to keep a hopeful smile on her lips, Jiang Yanli quickly began to pale.

"Let's go!" Wei Wuxian said, turning around.

THUNK

The sound came from directly behind him. Wen Ning had snapped his hand out just in time to catch an arrow that had been poised to reach Wei Wuxian's chest.

All the blood left Jiang Yanli's face.

"...Huh?" someone asked.

Dozens of people emerged from behind boulders and crannies in the valley. No, upon second thought, 'dozens' didn't cover it. The number of people gathered was well over three hundred. Most wore robes of Sparks Amidst Snow, but the robes of other sects were here as well.

There were other sects in support of this, but the Jin were clearly the main force.

'When Young Master Jin's people presented you with an invitation at the bottom of the Burial Mounds, I thought it had to be a trap,' Wen Ning had explained.

"Wait," Jin Zixuan muttered, slowly standing up. "Wait-"

All the people gathered were fully armed, wielding swords and bows and carrying arrows strapped to their backs. They were clad in armor and full of vigilance. Some bloodlust leaked out toward Wei Wuxian.

The watchers all stood tense, feeling the threats surrounding them on all sides. Nie Mingjue unconsciously reached for his saber; Wen Ruohan raised his hand as if preparing to take them out.

Standing at the center of the armed forces, there was the person who had fired the first shot: Jin Zixuan's own cousin.

'I thought it had to be a trap,' Wen Ning had said.

"It… wasn't though. Right?"

"Huh?" Jiang Cheng asked, glancing back. Jin Zixuan's eyes didn't turn toward him though. They were wide and haunted, staring directly at the space between Wei Wuxian and Jin Zixun.

"Wei Wuxian kills me, doesn't he?" Jin Zixuan muttered.

Frowning at the reminder, Lan Xichen slowly admitted, "Allegedly, yes."

Jin Zixuan continued to stare.

Jin Zixun, meanwhile, walked forward, smirking down at Wei Wuxian in an expression that looked nearly identical to one they'd seen on Wen Chao.

(In fact, that very same smile had been on his face when Wei Wuxian was thrown into the Burial Mounds. As Jin Zixuan looked up at his cousin now, he couldn't help but let a shiver run down his spine.)

Wei Wuxian had been invited to Jin Ling's one month celebration.

Before he even got there, an alliance of sects three hundred strong had surrounded them.

Jin Zixuan was the one that invited him.

'But… I wouldn't,' he thought. 'I wouldn't, I wouldn't, I wouldn't. Not to A-Li's shidi. I… I invited him! To attack someone you've invited is the height of dishonor. And Wei Wuxian was just… he was coming in peace. I wouldn't!'

But the weapons remained pointed Wei Wuxian's way just the same.

Finally:

"Who are you?" Wei Wuxian asked, looking directly at Jin Zixun as he did. This question made the young master of the Jins immediately lose the smirk he'd had. He instantly forgot about whatever he'd been about to say and began to fume.

"You dare ask who I am?" he demanded. "I'm Jin Zixun!"

Jin Guangshan was suddenly growing increasingly concerned about how the Jin Sect was doing without him.

Wei Wuxian looked over the crowd once more, frowning a bit as he recalled, 'Jin Zixun? He's Jin Zixuan's cousin, isn't he?'

Jin Zixuan flinched.

'What is he doing here?'

Wei Wuxian's frown deepened. The resentful energy within him seemed to tremble, only held down by Wei Wuxian's sheer force of will.

For a moment, the watchers said nothing.

Because they didn't know for sure that Jin Zixuan's invitation was actually an attempt to kill Wei Wuxian — which, if Wen Ning hadn't blocked that arrow, was exactly what would have occurred — and Wei Wuxian didn't want to draw any hasty conclusions, even if he and Jin Zixuan had never gotten along.

And sure, the Jin sect was the group that would gain the most from his death considering what Jin Zixun's subordinates had been caught doing to the Wens, but Jin Zixuan might not even know about all that! He could be completely uninvolved! And yeah, Jin Zixuan's brother might end up killing Nie Mingjue, chopping his body parts up, killing his own wife, killing his own son, and trying to kill Wei Wuxian once his actions were discovered, but that didn't mean Jin Zixuan would do anything even remotely similar!

It was possible Jin Zixuan hadn't planned Wei Wuxian's death.

It was equally possible that Jin Zixuan was as deserving of what would happen to him as Wen Chao had been.

And now, as a gust of wind brushed by, the tension both within and outside the simulation was palpable. The smile that had been on Wei Wuxian's face the whole journey over was gone. He looked over the gathered crowd with narrowed eyes, holding Chenqing in a vice-like grip.

Losing patience, Jin Zixun stepped forward and shouted, "Wei Wuxian, I'm warning you, lift the evil curse you put on me right now! I'm willing to overlook this matter if you do!"

Wei Wuxian blinked at that, furrowing his brows and asking, "What curse?"

"You're still pretending like you don't know anything? Fine!" He pulled open his robes. "I'll let you see what an evil curse this is!"

All along Jin Zixun's body, there were small holes that appeared to be carved into the skin. Some were as small as sesame seeds; others, as large as soybeans. They would only grow as time went on.

"A-Xun?" Madam Jin gasped and, simultaneously, Jin Zixuan paled. He was furious with his cousin, but the Hundred Holes curse was not something to take lightly. He didn't want Jin Zixun dead.

The Hundred Holes curse would become worse and worse over time, eventually reaching and rotting through the internal organs.

"Hundred Holes?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"That's right!"

Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes.

'I read up a bit on the curse back in the Cloud Recesses, when I was supposed to be writing out lines,' he recalled. 'It's painful and difficult to remove.'

That said-

"I see that you were cursed with the Hundred Holes, but why come block my path?" he asked. "What's it got to do with me?"

Jin Zixun scoffed, pulling his robes tight again as he pointed out, "Other than a criminal using wicked means like you, who could have put such a detestable thing on me?!"

"Who else? Anyone could have! That curse is public knowledge!" Nie Mingjue snapped. "Is that really all the evidence he has?!"

"It better not be," Madam Jin hissed, her eyes narrowing into slits.

Sure, there might be more to why Wei Wuxian was suspected. For one, Jin Zixun had been in charge of the Wen camp, treating people Wei Wuxian had come to care for as little better than livestock. He might not have been as directly involved in Wen Ning's death as the camp supervisors, but he was still the one who had allowed all that. Everyone had heard Wei Wuxian speak about how much he owed Wen Ning.

Wei Wuxian might, hypothetically, have a motive.

But, in all likelihood…

Lan Wangji breathed out slowly, his gaze colder than the mountains of the far north. Everyone in this world seemed to delight in accusing Wei Wuxian of every horrible thing they could fathom. It didn't matter how likely or even possible it was; if Wei Wuxian was someone they could blame, they would be happy to blame away.

And, on a separate note:

'There are plenty of people who would want to do that to him,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Does he… actually think lots of people like him? Saying that would probably make the situation worse, though.'

So instead:

"Jin Zixun, I don't handle situations in underhanded ways like that," Wei Wuxian declared. "If I want to kill someone, I'll let everyone know that person died by my hands. If I really wanted you to die, it would be a thousand times worse than what you're going through right now."

One had to look no further than what happened to Wen Chao to confirm those words as true. The cruelty he was capable of — as well as the sense of justice he had — both contributed to that. Wei Wuxian would only kill someone if their actions had been unjust. If so, like with the camp supervisors, he wouldn't try to hide it. He would want people to know what had happened and why, in the hopes that others would understand that they couldn't act the same.

However, lacking the knowledge they had, Jin Zixun's reaction was rather different:

"You've always been quite arrogant, huh?" he muttered. "To think you're bold enough to not admit to what you did!"

"I'm not the one who cursed you; why would I admit to that?"

Killing intent flashed in Jin Zixun's gaze as he hissed, "Courtesy before force. If you don't take this chance to repent, I won't let you off easily!"

"Oh, really?" Wei Wuxian grinned.

Wen Ruohan could barely resist letting out a scoff. Jin Guangshan's nephew and Wen Ruohan's second son were similar in the most annoying ways. Accusations like this could be solved simply. The Hundred Hole's Curse left traces on the caster as well, as they saw on the dark-robed figure who had been trying to stop them from finding Nie Mingjue's body parts. If Wei Wuxian simply showed his chest, there would be no denying his innocence.

(Under normal circumstances, at least. Considering this was the Yiling Patriarch, Jin Zixun would surely just say Wei Wuxian had somehow found a way to not receive those traces. He would have no proof and no justification for that claim, but everyone would believe it nonetheless. It was ridiculous. Jin Zixun wasn't trying to frame Wei Wuxian. He needed to figure out who had actually cursed him to cure himself. It was in his best interests to be rational about this.)

(Despite that, Wen Ruohan had no doubt things wouldn't be solved so easily.)

'There are two ways to break the curse,' Wei Wuxian recalled. 'The first is to convince the one who cast it to undo the curse, rescinding their cultivation. The second is, of course, to kill the one who placed the curse.'

Jiang Yanli let out a short, shallow gasp. She took in a slow breath, trying to calm herself down. As bad as the situation looked, this wasn't what would kill Wei Wuxian. Besides, Jin Zixun was wrong. If they could convince him of that, it would all be fine. Her shidi was here to attend her son's one-month celebration. Yes, they knew things were bound to turn wrong eventually, but couldn't they at least have this first? Thanks to what Jin Zixuan had done, the other Jiang Yanli would finally have a chance to convince the sect leaders of her shidi's innocence. If Jin Zixun had just waited for one more day then-

Well…

~~Perhaps, if he had just waited one more day, Wei Wuxian wouldn't have died at all.~~

And, as if in proof of that, hundreds of weapons were still pointed toward the Yiling Patriarch, murderous intent flashing in the eyes of everyone involved.

"...You won't let me off easily?" Wei Wuxian repeated, then laughed. "You? With just a few hundred people?"

Jin Zixun waved his arm and the surrounding cultivators nocked their arrows, aiming toward the center with steely eyes. They were certain they wouldn't miss.

"Zixun," Jin Zixuan said. "Zixun, make them stop."

It was an order.

However, inevitably, such a command would go unheard.

Spiritual energy began to pick up.

"Seriously! Stop!" Jin Zixuan commanded. "Just talk about this for a moment! You don't even have any proof!"

"Are they insane?" Nie Mingjue growled.

Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren glared fiercely, their hands clenched tight.

Jin Zixun unsheathed his blade.

"Zixun, I'm serious!" Jin Zixuan shouted. "Don't you dare attack him! My other self won't let you get away with this!"

And he wouldn't. If the simulated Jin Zixuan knew about this, he would make sure his cousin was punished appropriately.

(So long as he hadn't invited Wei Wuxian with the express purpose of entrapping him.)

(But that couldn't be true.)

Jin Zixuan clenched his hands together tightly enough to draw blood.

"Zixun!"

The single note was sharp and piercing, echoing throughout the entirety of the valley. It wasn't an unpleasant sound (Chenqing being much more finely crafted than the makeshift bamboo), but, to anyone who could sense resentful energy, it was near painful in its intensity.

However, right now, that appeared to be only them.

Wei Wuxian paused, looking around. Upon seeing that, Jin Zixun laughed.

"You think we don't know what you can do? We cleared out the entire valley before you arrived! You won't get any help no matter how much you play. This is a burial ground we've prepared just for you!"

"Dishonorable coward!" Nie Mingjue shouted. It would be one thing if they were truly enemies in a war, but they had invited Wei Wuxian to get him here. Now-

"You're seeking your own death," Wei Wuxian laughed.

Wen Ning reached up and, in a single, smooth motion, snapped off the red string that had been hanging around his neck. As soon as the talisman attached to that cord left his skin, his entire body seemed to transform. The muscles on his face began to twist, his veins becoming blackened as cracks covered his skin. With that, he let out an inhuman roar.

"Release!" Jin Zixun commanded.

The arrows flew.

"Zixun!" Jin Zixuan screamed.

A cloud of darkness spread out at once, knocking the arrows back. The corpses in the area may have been removed, but there was still plenty of resentful energy in Wei Wuxian's body he could make use of.

The so-called righteous cultivators mounted their swords and flew down toward him. Not wasting a second, Wei Wuxian brought Chenqing to his mouth and began to play.

♪♫♫♪♪♪♫

The notes were fast-paced and frantic, containing an urgency that Wei Wuxian's playing had never seemed to have before.

The watchers reacted at once, feeling tension fill their bodies with every note that played. Quite a few of them felt the call to help so strongly that they stood up, knocking down their chairs in the process.

(And they wanted to help. They would give anything to actually be there — to actually be able to help. However, even as they were called upon to protect Wei Wuxian, there was nothing they could do.)

Similarly, no matter how many notes played, Wen Ning was the only being in the simulation that could react to them.

(Luckily, if you were going to be stuck with just one, Wen Ning was a pretty damn good option.)

His irises were gone now, the veins on his neck bulging with power and the muscles in his body ready to react. He stepped forward, cracking stone under his heel, then launched himself into the sky. In the next second, the cultivators who had been trying to fly down to them were knocked off their swords and thrown into a nearby plateau. In less than a second, three had been taken down.

Three. Of three hundred.

Unable to stop himself, Lan Wangji ran over to Wei Wuxian. He stood by the Patriarch's side, watching an ever-continuing storm of arrows rain down upon Wei Wuxian.

He didn't necessarily think that Jin Zixuan had invited Wei Wuxian with this in mind. However, if that happened to be true…

The second jade's gaze hardened into an uncompromising steel.

Wen Ning continued on, tearing the Jins and other cultivators to shreds. He worked with ruthless efficiency, making blood fly into the air. Below, Wei Wuxian stepped to the side. One swordsman had snuck past Wen Ning, reaching close enough to attempt to take Wei Wuxian's head. The Yiling Patriarch dodged and remained on defense, using Wen Ning (who was now throwing carriage-sized boulders at the attackers) to take people down. The Ghost General was quite effective. However, hundreds of ambushers still surrounded them on all sides. They were beginning to close in.

'It's fine,' Jiang Yanli told herself. 'It's fine. A-Xian is strong. He'll be fine.'

She wrung her hands together, somewhat wishing, now, that Wei Wuxian had just stayed in the Burial Mounds with the Wens. At least then he wouldn't be walking into a carefully planned trap!

She had reached her hands out toward him, hoping to catch him as he fell. However, when Wei Wuxian put his trust in her, her weak body could never measure up. He let go of the tree and promptly crashed into the ground, spraining his ankle instead.

'No. It'll be fine. It'll be fine.' Jiang Yanli's hands started to shake. 'It's fine. They said he killed three thousand cultivators overnight. It won't be that hard to kill just three hundred. It'll be fine.'

But enemies were still all around Wei Wuxian, attacking as fiercely as they could. Most could be thrown back by Wen Ning. However, as the close range attacks continued, Wei Wuxian sent a blast of resentful energy forth that cleared away the dust. Thanks to that, it was soon revealed that the blade that had snuck past Wen Ning belonged to Jin Zixun.

There hadn't exactly been any doubt Jin Zixun wanted Wei Wuxian dead, but, upon seeing that, Jin Zixuan still felt his heart sink even more.

Jin Zixun charged forward again, forcing Wei Wuxian to dodge his every attack. He didn't come close to landing a hit, but, equally, wasn't in any danger himself. Wen Ning was dealing with the ones flying down and Wei Wuxian was using most of his energy to keep other attacks away from him.

The Jin laughed, shouting, "This is the price you'll pay for your arrogance! Let's see how long you can last without your sword!"

As it seemed to every time Wei Wuxian's missing sword was mentioned, Wen Ruohan's cultivation weighed down oppressively on everyone in the room.

With a flick of his hand, Wei Wuxian sent out a dozen talismans to knock back Jin Zixun's sword, cutting out the energy on it. A sword was still a sword, however. Jin Zixun continued on, his cultivation returning to his blade shortly after. More and more people came down. Wen Ning was able to deal with five out of every six. However, the number of blades Wei Wuxian had to dodge was going up bit by bit.

Attackers on all sides. No sword; no help; no rest. Wei Wuxian was outnumbered a hundred times over and was mainly just trying to run. Hands were reaching toward him no matter where he looked. It was… a familiar sight.

'It's like he's stuck in the Burial Mounds all over again,' Lan Wangji thought. Thousands of corpses coming at Wei Wuxian shouldn't look so similar to a few hundred trained cultivators, but they did nonetheless.

(Wei Wuxian might be making the connection too.)

For, with every attack that came, Wei Wuxian's resentful energy would come out a little bit harsher — a little bit fiercer — and little less interested in keeping track of who it was he killed. He fought and fought and fought and, regardless of whether he was remembering the Burial Mounds or the Sunshot Campaign right now, he seemed to be fighting with the practiced, merciless efficiency he'd needed to survive both those times.

Dodge, get out of the way, use corpses or talismans to kill.

Dodge, get out of the way, use corpses or talismans to kill.

Dodge. Kill. Dodge. Kill.

His eyes were now glowing red.

However, when Jin Zixun's sword swung down again, Wei Wuxian's jump to the side caused something to slip out of his sleeve. His eyes widened.

Seeing that reaction, Jin Zixun reached down and caught the box at once.

It was the present for Jin Ling.

Because Wei Wuxian had foolishly, naively, illogically thought Jin Zixuan was someone whose invitation he could trust. As the Jin heir watched his cousin look down at the box, he felt his stomach twist.

And that feeling only intensified when, after realizing what the box was for, Jin Zixun began to laugh.

"Give. It. Back," Wei Wuxian growled, throwing up a wall of resentful energy to block the barrage of arrows coming his way. "Give it back!"

Jin Zixun shook the box before Wei Wuxian's face, mocking, "What's this? A present for A-Ling?"

A blade speared toward Wei Wuxian's back, dodged only at the last second before the Yiling Patriarch knocked the attacker down. Simultaneously, a saber-wielding cultivator jumped down from above, forcing Wei Wuxian to send a blast of resentful energy up. It threw that cultivator to the side just long enough for Wei Wuxian to regain his footing. By that time, however, there were already three more people trying to attack. Arrows still rained down from above. No matter where he turned, there were always new figures coming in for the kill.

~~Like the Burial Mounds all over again.~~

~~In such a situation, how could he spare the thought to verbally respond to Jin Zixun?~~

Nonetheless, as if unable to resist, the Jin then continued, asking, "You didn't really think you could attend a-Ling's one-month celebration, did you?"

A simple question.

And yet one that made Wei Wuxian freeze for a moment, his hands trembling.

Wei Wuxian hadn't been able to attend his Shijie's wedding. He hadn't even known about it until a few days before — he'd had to be told about it by Lan Wangji. Wei Wuxian had been invited to Jin Ling's one month celebration, but, now…

(Had anyone actually been intending to let him come? Or was this just the perfect trap and the perfect bait, used to lure in someone who was cut off from everyone he loved simply because he'd done what was right?!)

Several arrows shot toward Wei Wuxian from behind, only knocked away by Wei Wuxian's resentful energy at the last possible moment. His eyes, still glowing red, scanned wildly over his surroundings. Murderous intent could be felt from all sides. Panting heavily, Wei Wuxian stepped back like a cornered animal looking for a way to escape.

The box still laid in Jin Zixun's hand, the smooth, polished wood gradually becoming scratched and marred by dirt in the process.

With a few sharp notes, Wei Wuxian sent a stream of resentful energy surging toward Jin Zixun. However, before it could surround the man, a gleaming silver blade struck the ground and dissipated its power.

"Stop!" someone shouted in the distance.

Everyone turned to look.

"Zixuan?" Jin Zixun asked. "Why are you here?!"

Jin Zixuan re-summoned his sword, shouting back, "Why do you think I'm here?!"

The response was aggressive and fierce. His eyes were wide with rage, but that rage appeared solely directed at Jin Zixun right now.

The real Jin Zixuan's eyes went wide.

"Where's A-Yao?" Jin Zixun asked, the familiar manner of speaking coming off easily. "Why isn't he here?!"

'A-Yao?' Lan Xichen mentally repeated. 'Why would Zixun expect him-'

"I ran into him at Koi Tower," Jin Zixuan explained. "If I hadn't seen him walking around looking a little panicked, I wouldn't have even known you two were planning something like this! Why didn't you tell me you were cursed with the Hundred Holes curse?! Why did you decide to do this without saying anything?!"

'Without saying anything.'

Those were the words used.

If true, it meant…

'It wasn't me,' Jin Zixuan thought, letting out the breath he'd been holding in. 'I meant to invite Wei Wuxian. I was being genuine. It wasn't a trap. I wanted him to come.'

(And Jin Guangyao had apparently been acting strangely. They didn't know the full story, but if someone as good at lying as him was behaving that way, then maybe he didn't support this either.)

Further explanation came shortly after:

"The fact that Jin Zixun had the Hundred Holes Curse was something he wouldn't dare to talk about," Lan Jingyi's voice announced. "For one, he had a 'favorable appearance' and a 'good physique.' He'd always thought of himself as 'handsome' and couldn't bear to let others know he was the victim of such an unsightly, repulsive curse."

Although Lan Jingyi appeared to be following the script this time, the inflections he used on certain words made his narration sound rather judgemental nonetheless. Lan Qiren withheld a sigh.

Still, he couldn't be too upset. Now that Jin Zixuan's simulated self had arrived, Lan Qiren couldn't help but feel a wave of reassurance fall over him. In the Burial Mounds, Wei Wuxian had received no help. Now, Jin Zixuan was here!

However…

The fighting around them hadn't come to a halt. Arrows still flew toward Wei Wuxian, held back only by the defensive wall of resentment around him. Whenever a swordsman attacked, Wen Ning would still have to hold them off.

Lan Jingyi continued, "To be cursed meant Jin Zixun's cultivation wasn't very high; his spiritual energy was too weak to hold out against it. The only one he'd told about it was Jin Guangshan, who he'd begged to find him medics and curse specialists. In the end though, they failed."

"Zixuan, help me!" Jin Zixun cried out, his wide eyes glued to the crimson red ones glaring his way.

And Jin Zixuan, upon seeing that, felt his stomach twist in disgust.

'How am I supposed to look at him the same way now that he's done this?'

It didn't matter right now. Lan Jingyi's narration continued on:

"With all known cures having failed, Jin Zixun became more desperate than ever. At this time, Jin Ling's one-month celebration happened to be approaching. Taking the initiative, Jin Ling's dad had gone and genuinely invited Wei Wuxian to it. However, Jin Guangshan wasn't pleased about the invitation Senior Wei had received."

“Huh? What does that-”

“The former Sect Leader Jin spoke with Jin Zixun, suggesting to him that the banquet could be used as an opportunity to kill Wei Wuxian, meaning… meaning Jin Guangshan wouldn’t have to welcome him to Koi Tower after all.”

There was a pause.

“Huh?” Jin Zixuan asked.

“They were worried Jin Ling’s mom would find out if they told his dad, so Jin Zixuan wasn’t informed.”

And thus:

“Zixuan! Hide it from Sister-in-law! Just for now!” Zixun requested. “I’ll give you two a formal apology once the curse is gone!”

“A formal apology?!” Jiang Yanli cried out, her voice breaking as she did. “You — dishonorable, spiteful, coward!”

Her eyes burned with tears, but, this time, she refused to look away. This wasn’t like Wei Wuxian being thrown into the Burial Mounds. This was happening because of her. Now, more than ever, she couldn’t avert her eyes. Jin Zixuan swallowed once, gazing upon the scene in the same way.

It had been some time since they had last seen Jin Zixuan in the simulation. He looked more mature now, his hair longer than before and his shoulders far broader than they had been. Now, voice steady, he addressed the still-battling crowd:

“There’s still time to salvage the situation. All of you, stop now!”

An arrow nearly took out Wei Wuxian’s eye. Wen Ning took out the shooter in exchange.

“Stop it!” Jin Zixuan shouted again.

‘If Wei Wuxian had invited one of them to the Burial Mounds and then attacked, would the situation still be considered ‘salvageable?’’ Wen Ruohan wondered.

His thoughts weren’t necessarily a criticism of Jin Zixuan’s actions. If the boy’s goal was simply to de-escalate the situation, saying something like this was a reasonable thing to do. However, Wei Wuxian had never had an amicable relationship with the heir. The attackers, while mostly Jins, didn’t respect Jin Zixuan enough to stop on his command.

The battle continued on, Jin Zixuan’s glare sharpening as his words were ignored. He looked back at his cousin for support, but was only met with a fierce glare.

Jin Zixun growled, asking, “You still think there’s any salvaging a situation like this? Do you not see these things all over me?!”

"Anyone could have done that!" Jiang Cheng shouted back.

"Do not succumb to rage," Lan Qiren recited. "Do not slander others. Do not make assumptions about others."

As silly as it was to recite Lan rules to a Jin, those words, right now, were all he could manage. He needed something to ground him when faced with a sight — a predicted future — as preposterous as this.

Arrows flew down toward Wei Wuxian again and he leapt back to dodge them. Due to the minimal number of corpses in the area, the resentment here was thin. His protective wall was starting to crack.

Because Wei Wuxian was a resentful cultivator, someone who "ignored ethics and morality," as Lan Qiren had once said. Jin Zixun's actions and faults were his own. The possible influence of Jin Guangshan aside, the other watchers were not involved.

~~Except they were. As soon as demonic cultivation was decried as 'evil,' all its cultivators would seem that way too.~~

Now, no matter how many rules Lan Qiren recited in his head, nothing seemed to calm him down.

"Zixun, this is-"

"You know that I can't wait!" Jin Zixun responded, pulling open his robe to reveal the ugly gashes. "Don't tell me you'll disregard your cousin's life for the sake of Sister-in-law's shidi!"

"You know that's not it!" Jin Zixuan shouted back. "He might not even be the one who cursed you to begin with! Why can't you wait?! I was the one who invited Wei Wuxian to A-Ling's one-month celebration. When you people act like this, where does that leave me? Where does that leave my wife?!"

Wei Wuxian punched forward, sending a golden-robed cultivator flying back. He panted heavily, hands shaking just a bit. Despite that, his gaze remained fixated on the wooden box clutched in Jin Zixun's hand.

It was a brilliant, flawless, one of a kind creation.

'Someone like him doesn't deserve to touch it,' Wen Ruohan thought, narrowing his eyes. If, in this moment, Wei Wuxian had the protection of the Wen Sect, then it wouldn't matter whether he was responsible for Jin Zixun's curse; no one would have dared try something like this.

(But, instead of doing that, Wen Ruohan had declared war, gotten himself killed, and left Wei Wuxian to clean up his mess.)

To the side, Wen Qing watched with an unreadable, stone-cold expression. Despite that, her hands were clenched tightly by her sides, the nails digging into her skin.

And her grip only became tighter when Jin Zixun continued, "It's all for the best if he doesn't attend. Who does Wei Wuxian think he is, anyways?! Is he even worthy of attending our family's banquet?! Whoever touches him will be stained black! Zixuan, when you invited him, weren't you worried that yours, Sister-in-Law's, and A-Ling's reputations would be stained by that for the rest of your lives?!"

"Shut your mouth!"

But Jin Zixun wasn't backing down.

Lan Qiren threw the scroll, shouting, "You would be reversing the natural order… completely ignoring ethics and morality!'

And then the Lan Sect had gone and allowed the Wen remnants to be picked off one by one, Wei Wuxian being the only one brave enough to stop that.

'Why does Wei Ying not carry his sword?' the simulated Nie Mingjue asked.

As if Huaisang didn't do the exact same thing. As if his own cultivation wasn't equally demonic.

'You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anyone else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!'

Madam Yu looked down.

'Whoever touches him will be stained black,' Jin Zixun declared.

Because the Yiling Patriarch was evil, so nothing more needed to be said.

However, at that moment, the two Jins were in a deadlock.

"A-Li wanted him to come. You have no right to question that."

"You're never rational when it comes to her. Him being there will ruin us all!"

"I'm ordering you to stop!"

"Zixuan!"

As Jin Zixun's anger reached its peak, he clenched down tightly. Pathetic his cultivation might be, but he was still a cultivator. There was a crack, then a snap.

The precious box shattered in an instant.

The jade tassel was grinded into dust.

In that moment, everything else seemed to wash out. The tassel itself could be replaced. It was the product of weeks of Wei Wuxian's hard work, but, now that he'd done it once, he could always make it again. However, upon seeing it get crushed before their eyes, no one could dismiss this as just a temporary setback.

'You didn't really think you could attend a-Ling's one month celebration, did you?'

The crumpled remains fell to the ground.

And, in the next instant, all the resentment in the air morphed into a pitch-black hate.

The watchers gasped, most falling to their knees. The resentment around them was almost too thick for them to breathe through. The world seemed to spin, cries of agony and vengeance pouring in from every corner of the room.

Wei Wuxian lunged-

"Wei Wuxian, haven't you done enough yet?!" Jin Zixuan demanded, cutting him off.

"He hasn't done anything!" the real Jin Zixuan hissed back, wishing, more than ever before, that he could punch his other self in the face.

(It was a familiar feeling, but never in a situation so dire, before. The simulated Jin Zixuan had spent 20 years living with Zixun and, for most of his life, had viewed Wei Wuxian as a pest. Someone who had punched him in the Cloud Recesses, no matter why. He didn't understand anything.)

And Wei Wuxian, right now, was forced to have Wen Ning handle his protection. His eyes were alight, the red glow intense enough to melt metal in an instant. He gasped, breathing in deeply but never having enough air to properly think. All around him, the sounds of battle wore on.

There were screams around him.

Hate, around him.

Resentment*, around him.

The cloud of energy circling Wei Wuxian clouded his vision. Now, the continuously-attacking cultivators were closer to black, shadowed figures than anything else. Then, a few moments later, an illusion seemed to cover them. This mirage seemed to have been added in by the spirits who had assembled the simulation. Because of it, for a instant, the attacking cultivators were the Wen — not the remnants Wei Wuxian had saved, but the soldiers he'd fought for years on end. A second later, it shifted once more. Now, all they saw were fierce corpses. The sight only lasted for an instant, but the fear it brought remained.

The Burial Mounds seemed to surround them again. The resentment reached its peak.

Dodge. Kill. Dodge. Kill. Dodge. Kill.

The corpses approached.

Dodge. Kill. Dodge. Kill.

M*or*e c*or*pse*s came.

Do*dge* Kill

“Wei Wuxian!” someone said.

The voice was Jin Zixuan’s. It sounded distant and muddled, like they were hearing it from underwater. The resentful energy raged on.

“Wei Wuxian!” Jin Zixuan shouted again. “Tell Wen Ning to stop first! He’s aggravating the situation further!”

And yes, convincing one person to stop was easier than convincing three hundred. However, as Jin Zixuan looked upon his other self, all he could do was gape at that request.

An arrow shot down from behind Wei Wuxian, out of Jin Zixuan’s line of sight. The ever-thinning wall of resentment just barely managed to block it off, giving Wen Ning time to respond. Wei Wuxian was no longer in a state where he could dodge.

Slowly, the Yiling Patriarch forced out, “Why don’t you make them stop first?”

His voice was hoarse. His eyes, unfocused. Another attack came.

The c*orp*ses were ri*ght the*re-

Shouts and roars came from all around, the battle going on despite Zixuan’s words. Those sounds were all drowned out now, dulled under the deafening sound of roaring water echoing in Wei Wuxian’s head. His resentful energy curled around him with clear intention.

The*y* were r*ight* the*re-*

“Why are you being so stubborn at a time like this?!” Jin Zixuan shouted, his voice becoming more washed out with every word. “Once all of you calm down, we can go to Koi Tower to explain things and answer some questions. Once everything’s clear, if you aren’t the one who did it, you’ll be fine! Tell Wen Ning to stop!”

“Tell him to stop?” Wei Wuxian laughed. “The second I do, arrows will come flying at me and swords will pierce my heart! You think I could explain things at Koi Tower?!”

“They won’t do that!”

“Just stop talking!” Jin Zixuan shouted, taking a futile swing at his other self. “Just — you should just…”

Side with the person you’ve never trusted and never liked?

(Still, who looks at a battle that's three hundred against two and tells the two they've gone too far?)

It didn't matter either way. Wei Wuxian just laughed.

"They wouldn't?" he repeated. "How would you ensure that? Jin Zixuan, I have a question. When you invited me, did you really not know about their plans to kill me?!"

"I didn't. I didn't, I didn't, I didn't-"

But the simulated Jin Zixuan did not look at Wei Wuxian as the only victim here. They were not friends nor allies. All Jin Zixuan knew was that his cousin didn't have proof; Wei Wuxian might indeed have cursed Jin Zixun. Thus, when accused like that, the simulated Jin Zixuan didn't experience the soul-crushing guilt his real-self felt. Instead, the feeling that filled him was anger.

"You?! Are you mad?! Wei Wuxian, you're out of your mind!"

"Shut up!" Jin Zixuan screamed, moving to stand by Wei Wuxian's side.

The two of them had never been friends. Zixuan's family had abused the Wens and coveted Wei Wuxian's seal and ambushed him. In all honesty, who wouldn't suspect Jin Zixuan under circumstances like those?

(Even Jin Zixuan himself had started to. It wouldn't be the first time the simulation had shown their future selves to be willing to do something despicable.)

"Please say you didn't," he muttered.

But the simulated Jin Zixuan couldn't hear. He continued to glare at Wei Wuxian, the tension in his stance presenting a confrontational view rather than a pacifying one. Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes, the resentment curling around him protectively. Right now, the feeling carried in that energy was hatred.

At Jin Zixuan.

Madam Jin swallowed nervously.

When Wei Wuxian looked up, his crimson glare relayed his rage. He was still panting heavily, using Wen Ning to keep an eye on any attack that might come his way, but his gaze remained locked on Jin Zixuan alone. The darkness of the resentment around him continued to cloud his view.

"Jin Zixuan, move away right now," Wei Wuxian ordered. "I won't touch you, but you better not provoke me."

That was a warning.

It sounded like a threat.

Thus, upon hearing it, Zixuan's face clouded in rage.

"Why can't you just back off for once?!" he demanded, lunging forward toward Wei Wuxian. He raised an arm, trying to grab onto Wei Wuxian's shoulder.

The hatred — the anger — the viciousness that approached… far from being strange, it was, again, all far too familiar. In Yiling, countless creatures tried to do just the same. After being stuck in the Burial Mounds for a month, Wei Wuxian had learned how to deal with them. Such a reaction had become habitual — instinctual. And thus, at that moment, Wen Ning did exactly what Wei Wuxian wanted him to do. He protected his master from the untrustworthy, hateable foe. He stopped the enraged figure approaching them. He, in his mindless state, identified someone with the same blood as those that were attacking them — the same blood as the people who had imprisoned him somewhere that killed him a mere year ago.

A wet, squelching sound filled the air.

Not a single person could move.

The figure approaching Wei Wuxian came to a stop. Slowly, they both looked down.

A hand had pierced through Jin Zixuan's chest.

"...A-Xuan?" Madam Jin asked.

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened once more.

"A-Li…" Jin Zixuan gasped out. "A-Li… is still waiting for you… at the Golden Tower… for A-Ling's… one month banquet."

Because he had meant to invite Wei Wuxian. As far as he had known, there were no traps; no scheme. Neither he nor Wei Wuxian had trusted each other, but they had both gotten into this situation hoping to, one day, get along.

So this scene right here, with Wen Ning's hand piercing through his chest, couldn't be right.

And yet, at that moment, Jin Zixuan fell to the ground nonetheless.

Jiang Yanli was pale. Jiang Cheng seemed faint. Lan Xichen was trembling. Nie Mingjue looked sick. Not a single one of them knew what to say.

'Wei Wuxian is a monster! Yanli treated him like her own brother!'

To the people in the future, the fact that Wei Wuxian had killed Jin Ling's parents went without saying. The watchers had been divided on this at first. Then, for some time, they had thought it was a lie or a trick. Later, though they didn't say it out loud, the situation with the Wen remnants had brought a different question into their minds. Had Jin Zixuan, somehow, deserved it?

But now…

Now, they could see…

“It was… an accident?” Madam Jin muttered, barely seeming to understand the words she spoke.

Jin Zixuan’s body laid unmoving on the ground below.

“Oh.” Jiang Yanli opened her mouth then closed it again, staring blankly at the scene. “Oh. Oh.”

Her eyes began to water once more.

“Oh.”

It had been so sudden, so unplanned, that even Wei Wuxian didn’t seem to realize what was going on. He stared down as well, his eyes finally losing that devastating shade of red. The crimson spreading across Jin Zixuan’s chest more than made up for that, though.

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian asked.

But the world still didn’t change.

‘What happened?’ the Yiling Patriarch wondered, the question sounding like it was coming out of a lost child. ‘What? What? How did things go wrong so fast? That’s not right. It can’t be like this. Something must have gone wrong somewhere.’

As though this was a simple matter of perspective, and not a death that would never be undone.

Then, from all around, the ambushers began to cry out:

“The… the Ghost General has gone mad!”

“He killed him! He killed him!”

They had been in a stalemate as Jin Zixuan approached Wei Wuxian. No more attacks were happening. And yet, at that moment, the mediator was killed. Someone who wasn’t trying to fight — who had only been trying to stop them.

Looking at the raw, bare facts of the situation, the people in the far-future had been right. Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning had killed Jin Zixuan. Jin Zixuan hadn’t deserved it. He shouldn’t be dead. That had been told to them in the very beginning of the simulation. Now, they had finally seen it happen.

And yet, in this moment, there was only one thing on Jin Zixuan’s mind:

‘Why on earth did you lunge at him?!’

His dead other self, lying on the ground in the distant future, had nothing to say.

'You… couldn't you see what was going on? Three hundred people were surrounding him — three hundred people including our cousin and you thought you should jump at him?! He literally told you he thought you had invited him with the intention of taking his life and you tried to grab on?! That's… that's-'

It wasn't entirely fair for Jin Zixuan to blame himself. For one, his simulated self had vastly incomplete information. As much as Wei Wuxian didn't trust him, he equally didn't trust Wei Wuxian. He was trying to help. It was just-

It was just that, much like with the soup incident from so long ago, his righteous anger was directed in the wrong way, at the wrong person, and all he managed to do was make the situation worse. If he couldn't stop his own family from attacking his guest, he had no right to invite them in the first place.

And, moreso-

'Jin Guangshan wasn't pleased about the invitation Senior Wei had received. The former Sect Leader Jin spoke with Jin Zixun, suggesting to him that the banquet could be used as an opportunity to kill Wei Wuxian, meaning… meaning Jin Guangshan wouldn't have to welcome him to Koi Tower after all.'

Forget Jin Zixun's faulty assumptions and rash judgment. If that narration was true, then didn't the attack on Wei Wuxian have more to do with the politics of who Jin Zixuan was 'allowed' to invite than the curse itself? Even Jin Zixun had said the same!

'Zixuan, when you invited him, weren't you worried that your, Sister-in-Law's, and A-Ling's reputations would be stained by that for the rest of your lives?!'

It had been Meng Yao's 'obvious panic' that had made him run over.

'Would someone like him, someone as perfect at lying as him, really make a mistake like that?'

Wei Wuxian had killed him.

Wen Ning had torn his heart out before anyone could react.

But Jin Zixuan's own family might have been the only ones who wanted anything like this to happen.

"W-what are you doing?!" Jin Zixun shouted, getting over his panic before anyone else. "Release! Release the arrow-!"

He cut off abruptly, the hulking, undefeatable Ghost General grabbing hold of his neck. The corpse's grip tightened, making the Jin cry out in pain.

No one could react to that. No one could even try to.

Wei Wuxian still stood there helplessly, unmoving.

'No,' he thought.

He continued staring blankly at Jin Zixuan's form.

'I was… clearly controlling Wen Ning properly,' he told himself. 'I'd ordered Wen Ning to go berserk, but I still should've been able to control him. I've always been able to control him perfectly. I didn't want Jin Zixuan dead! I've never wanted him dead! It was just… it was just, in that moment I suddenly couldn't stop it. I lost control. I never wanted him dead!'

"Not consciously, at least," Wen Ruohan muttered under his breath.

But survival instincts weren't something that could just be ignored.

'I never… I never-'

But Jin Zixuan was still there, the Ghost General's footprints engraved onto the ground behind him.

The sight was enough to make anyone feel sick. And now, as Wen Qing looked between her brother and Wei Wuxian, she found herself gritting her teeth together in rage.

(Was it her fault? Had this all happened because of the help she'd asked Wei Wuxian to give? He hadn't been able to see his shijie's wedding because of her. Now, his reputation was the reason Jin Guangshan didn't want him to come. The Stygian Tiger Seal was obviously a factor and the distrust of demonic cultivation ~~and Wei Wuxian's missing core~~ but, if Wen Qing hadn't given them such a clear excuse to isolate Wei Wuxian…)

(But, if she hadn't approached him, her brother would have remained just a mindless corpse forever.)

(Then what should she have done?)

That same question appeared to be consuming Wei Wuxian, who watched the puddle of blood spreading from Jin Zixuan grow larger and larger with each second that passed. The red approached the ends of his white robes, coloring them in a vibrant hue. Arrows were shooting down from all around and screams filled the air, but, right now, everything was distant. Wei Wuxian seemed to have a general awareness that there was sound around him, but identifying it would be impossible right now. Static filled the watcher's ears, drowning out all other noise in the world.

'Didn't you say you knew what you should and shouldn't do?'

Those words were from Wei Wuxian's thoughts, but the man himself had no response, now.

'Didn't you say that you could control it?! That there couldn't possibly be a problem and that nothing would ever happen?!'

Lan Wangji tensed, hearing his own questions swing back toward Wei Wuxian at full force.

‘But… but-’

The resentment got thicker and thicker around them, darkening the sky into a cloudy black. Little by little, all light was cut off from Wei Wuxian.

Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang fell to the ground, no longer able to resist the resentment pouring down from all sides.

’But-!’

The resentment spiked.

Suddenly, everything went black.

The watchers straightened up at once, feeling the pressure that had been weighing down on them finally ease. They looked up toward the simulation once more, waiting for an explanation, but there was nothing to be found but darkness there. Several seconds passed, no light coming their way.

“Wei Ying?” Lan Wangji asked.

The darkness remained. Two dozen seconds passed without change. There was nothing in sight, no resentful energy to be found, and the only sound they could hear was the lingering soft static in the background.

Everything was gone.

“Wei Ying?!” Lan Wangji asked again, his heart rate picking up. Wen Qing began to march forward, hoping, somehow, that a clue to what was going on could be found.

However, there was nothing left.

But then-

Wei Wuxian’s eyes opened. Light returned.

They were back in the Demon Slaughtering Cave.

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan nearly collapsed in relief at that. The simulated Jin Zixuan was now dead and Jiang Yanli now a widow, but, after what they had seen, the idea that the Jin might have captured the unconscious Wei Wuxian had filled them with nothing but fear. It felt inherently contradictory, but the Burial Mounds truly seemed like the only place that could be considered safe for Wei Wuxian. Right now, even the Jiang Sect…

Even the Jiang Sect, ~~which had declared Wei Wuxian an enemy of all the sects,~~ might not protect him now.

Jiang Cheng clenched his hands into fists. Throughout the past scene, his nephew's face had constantly flashed in in his mind. They all knew full well what Jin Ling thought about his father's death. He had said it clearly after the incident with Xue Yang. Lan Sizhui had tried to defend 'Mo Xuanyu,' claiming that evil didn't necessarily lie in demonic cultivation.

'You know, before we came to Yi City, a lot of people also claimed that the Yueyang Chang Clan's Chang Ping was killed by Xiao Xingcheng Daozhang's hands. But was that the truth?'

'Nobody ever actually saw whether or not Chang Ping Daozhang was killed by Xiao Xingchen! All they had were guesses, so why are you calling them claims?! But just try to count how many cultivators lost their lives to Wei Ying, Wen Ning — to the Stygian Tiger Seal! These are truths that everybody accepts, that no one can deny!'

'But-'

'And what can't be forgotten is that he ordered Wen Ning to kill my mother and father!'

'Ordered,' was the word used. It wasn't technically untrue and they hadn't seen what had happened to Jiang Yanli yet, but…

Would anyone really summarize the situation like that?

The static noise was finally disappearing. Now, instead, they could hear two voices on the right. It was Wen Qing and Wen Ning, conversing in hushed tones.

Wei Wuxian sat up, trembling as he did. Wen Ning — returned to his fully conscious state — looked back.

The sight of Wen Ning's arm going through Jin Zixuan's chest flashed in Wei Wuxian's mind.

And-

BAM

"Wei Wuxian!" Wen Qing shouted, standing up again.

Wei Wuxian had punched Wen Ning in the jaw, knocking him to the ground. The simulated Wen Qing could only clench her hands into fists, looking away.

Because nothing would fix what had just occurred.

Wei Wuxian grabbed onto the lapels of Wen Ning's robes, pulling him up.

"Who did you kill?!" the Yiling Patriarch roared, shaking Wen Ning back and forth. "Do you even know who you just killed?!"

Jin Zixuan flinched.

"You could have killed anyone else. Why did you have to kill Jin Zixuan?!"

A-Yuan dropped his butterfly toy, trembling at the shouts. Granny Wen quickly swept down, pulling him away.

To the side, tears started to roll down Wen Qing's cheeks. She flinched every time Wei Wuxian shook Wen Ning, but didn't try to intervene.

Everything had gone wrong.

Wei Wuxian seemed to gasp out for a moment, barely able to speak, then asked, "With him dead, what is Shijie supposed to do?"

"A-Xian, I-"

"What is her son supposed to do?!"

"Wei Ying-"

"What am I supposed to do?!"

Whether within the simulation or outside, no one could respond.

That had been his one and only chance to reconnect with his family from the past. Jiang Yanli had told everyone that she viewed Wei Wuxian as her actual brother; Wei Wuxian repaid that to his 'sister' in kind. While he didn't regret protecting the Wens, he wouldn't have chosen this method if he had any other options.

A single path to gain his family back had opened up to him.

Now, he wouldn't even be able to dream of going back to those times. Not now — not after he'd killed Jin Zixuan.

The Jin heir clenched his hands into fists, biting down on his lip so hard that it started to bleed.

'They didn't listen to me,' he thought. 'I told my sect to stop attacking my guest and no one cared. I'm the sect heir and yet… I had to try and convince Wei Wuxian to stop instead.'

He had brought the Jin to war, hadn't he? He had led them then, hadn't he? When he told them all to stop and back off, why hadn't they listened?

'I… wasn't told about Zixun and Father's plan. More than that, I wasn't able to figure it out until last minute even though they were planning it right under my nose! I know I was probably busy preparing for A-Ling's one month celebration, but… couldn't I have done more? Something to somehow make it clear that Wei Wuxian was my guest — that he had my protection?'

Jin Zixuan's other self had only invited Wei Wuxian for Jiang Yanli. There was no trust between them, no other reason for him to do that.

‘Zixun was the one running the Wen camps. Even after Wei Wuxian broke them out, did I seriously never take a second look to figure out why? Not enough of one to notice the toddlers my family had brought there?! Was I so caught up in A-Li and my blissful new life that I let this all happen right under me?’

His future-self had just died. However, right now, that strangely seemed like the least important part of what they’d just been shown.

Jin Zixuan was the only one who felt that way. Wei Wuxian, right now, looked willing to give almost anything up for a chance to redo today. The mix of rage, confusion, helplessness, and despair gave his shouts a raw, cutting edge.

That very edge was enough to make A-Yuan cry.

As soon as the child’s sobs echoed through the cave, Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened. He let go of Wen Ning’s collar, turning toward the source of the sound. Then, he looked down.

‘Just why was I locking myself up in the Burial Mounds all these years? Why do I have to go through this? Why did I choose to walk this path? Why did I turn myself into this? What do others see me as? What did I have to gain from this? Have I gone mad? Have I gone mad? Have I gone mad?!’

His breath hitched, his own thoughts threatening to consume him whole.

Neither Wen Qing nor Wen Ruohan could resist giving a slight flinch. Wei Wuxian had done this for the Wen. He had done this because of the two of them. If he was looking for someone to blame…

There was no one better than them, right?

(Then again, no one here was completely uninvolved.)

Jiang Cheng stared at the ground. Jiang Yanli’s sobs went on without end. Madam Yu gazed blankly, nearly uncomprehending. Nie Huaisang had returned to Nie Mingjue’s side, but neither brother had the presence of mind to pay attention to the other right now. Madam Jin and Jin Zixuan couldn’t speak. Lan Qiren was pale. Lan Xichen was silent. Lan Wangji looked over at Wei Wuxian’s form, feeling more powerless than ever before.

Jin Guangshan gave a small sigh.

‘It really is tragic that someone so capable would make such poor choices in the end,’ he thought.

~~However, he kept those thoughts to himself. Wen Ruohan had been behaving a little strangely recently; Jin Guangshan had a feeling saying that aloud would end rather poorly for him.~~

Then, at that moment, Wei Wuxian’s voice pierced the silence once more:

‘If only… I hadn’t chosen this path.’

“No,” Lan Wangji whispered. “No, Wei Ying, you chose right. You-”

He cut himself off.

Wei Wuxian had been right, for all that the world constantly told him he was wrong. Lan Wangji closed his eyes.

‘If my other self had been willing to leave everything behind and side with you… would the Lan have investigated more deeply? Would people have taken a second look? Could we have avoided this fate?’

He didn’t know. But, at that moment, the second jade of Lan couldn’t help but feel a bit of hatred for his other self.

Wei Wuxian’s gaze was fixated on the ground. Then, across from him:

“I’m… sorry,” Wen Ning whispered softly.

“A-Ning, no,” Wen Qing protested. “No, no-”

The corpse’s face could not move as it wished. Sobs would not echo; tears would not fall. However, at that moment, Wen Ning’s expression couldn’t be described as anything but pain.

“I’m sorry. It… it was all my fault. I’m sorry. I’m sorry-”

“It wasn’t,” Jiang Yanli whispered, too quietly to be heard. “Wen Ning, it wasn’t.”

Jin Zixuan couldn’t say a word.

And, as Wei Wuxian looked down at Wen Ning, he couldn’t help but laugh.

‘No, it’s not Wen Ning’s fault,’ he thought. ‘It’s mine.’

His eyes were wide.

‘When on a rampage, Wen Ning is nothing more than a weapon. I’m the one who created that weapon. My orders were the ones he listened to.’

And that was true. The watchers knew it to be true. In the moment Jin Zixuan approached, they had all felt Wei Wuxian’s order to attack.

(They had all felt his fear.)

‘I was the one who lost control. I was the one who was too confident in myself. I was the one who ignored all the ominous signs up until now.’

But, just as he’d told Lan Wangji, what other choice did he have? What more was there to do?

At present, the only truly moral choice he had was simply to remain in the Burial Mounds forever, never even trying to see Jiang Yanli. If he had done that, Jin Zixuan wouldn't be dead.

But who in their right mind would ever expect someone to do that? Who, of everyone here, would have managed even a fraction of what Wei Wuxian had done? Who here would have the audacity to say they would when Wei Wuxian was the only one who did?

But now-

Wei Wuxian, unable to stand any longer, took a step back and fell to the ground. He sat on the stone steps, losing all the strength he'd had. As he looked up at Wen Ning, a second image overlayed on top of the corpse. Rather than Wen Ning's pale, lifeless face, it was Jin Zixuan's staring back at him.

(Equally pale; equally dead.)

'Shijie… finally got to marry the person she loved. She'd had to overcome so much for that, but she finally made it there. And their son — A-Ling received his courtesy name from me. He was still so young. Just seven days after he was born, he knew to laugh wherever he saw his father's sword. Both his parents had been ecstatic. And now, during his one-month celebration…'

Suddenly, every interaction they had seen Wei Wuxian and Jin Ling have seemed to take on a new, far more painful light.

Wei Wuxian had never wanted Jin Zixuan dead.

All he'd wanted, in the end, was to see his Shijie again.

But, because he'd chosen to protect the innocent — because he was the son of a servant and not a young master from an established clan — cultivation society as a whole wouldn't allow that to occur.

It was hopeless.

He had nothing left.

Wei Wuxian shook, tears streaming down his cheeks. He buried his face in his hands, his cut-off, broken sobs echoed in the cave.

"...Can someone tell me… what I'm supposed to do now?"

No answer came. No one knew of one to give.

The last time they had seen Wei Wuxian cry was after the fall of Lotus Pier. Back then, however, Wei Wuxian had no control over the resentful energy in his midst.

Now, the weight of his grief could crash down on them full-force.

And yet, still, no one had anything they could say.

The segment came to a close.

The segment had ended. In some ways, this felt like the end of far more than that. Wei Wuxian had spent years in the Burial Mounds with the Wens. Slowly, it had started seeming like things were going to turn out all right.

Now, though….

'Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground.'

"...What's going to happen now?" Jiang Cheng asked.

Madam Yu looked away, for once unable to say anything in response.

Jin Zixuan was dead.

The Jins had ambushed Wei Wuxian first!

Jin Zixuan wasn't part of that.

How, at that moment, could Wei Wuxian have known?

He'd lost control. He hadn't meant to kill Jin Zixuan. Jin Zixuan was dead regardless.

Why had he lunged toward Wei Wuxian? The watchers' sensitivity to resentment was higher than ever. They had felt the hate filling Jin Zixuan in that moment.

(He and Wei Wuxian had never trusted each other. They had never even liked each other. It felt almost inevitable for something like this to occur.)

If Jin Zixun just hadn't gotten cursed — if he hadn't suspected Wei Wuxian and ambushed him then-

Well…

Could they really say that things wouldn't have gone wrong at some point or another regardless?

'Jin Guangshan wasn't pleased about the invitation Senior Wei had received. The former Sect Leader Jin spoke with Jin Zixun, suggesting to him that the banquet could be used as an opportunity to kill Wei Wuxian, meaning… meaning Jin Guangshan wouldn't have to welcome him to Koi Tower after all.'

In a small, hesitant motion, Jin Zixuan turned to look at Jin Guangshan.

"F-father?" he asked.

Jin Guangshan looked back, momentarily caught off guard by the sudden address, and quickly said, “It’s… it’s quite tragic, what just occurred. It’s a good thing we’re seeing this now. I must say, Meng Yao behaving the way he did seems quite suspicious in hindsight. If A-Xun gets cursed in our world, we can-”

“Father, did you… did you actually think Wei Wuxian might be the cause? When you told Zixun to go after him?”

“Well… well, of course I did! I’m sorry to say it, but, with the world as it was, suspecting the Yiling Patriarch was a natural thing to do. The versions of us within the simulation don’t know what we know now. He’s quite powerful and-”

“And it would be inconvenient for you to have to welcome someone you’d made public enemy number one, huh?” Nie Mingjue couldn’t help but add. Nie Huaisang, standing just a little behind his brother, watched carefully.

Wen Ruohan gave a short laugh, adding, “If I’m remembering correctly, it was Jiang Wanyin that gave Wei Wuxian that position.”

Jiang Cheng flinched.

And, capitalizing on that, Jin Guangshan immediately added, “Of course! What was it, ‘Wei Wuxian has betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy?’ In a situation like that, and when his own shidi says as much, how could he not be suspected?”

“No! No, I-” Jiang Cheng cut off. “I was just… I didn’t mean for any of this-”

“Of course you didn’t,” Madam Yu agreed. “Don’t be ridiculous, Jin Guangshan. You expect us to believe you thought Wei Wuxian was responsible? The future’s juniors made your true intentions quite clear!”

“The future’s juniors are obviously misinformed on nearly everything! Why would you believe it just because they think it’s true?” Jin Guangshan countered.

“Whether the juniors say it or not, it was certainly implied,” Lan Qiren pointed out, a stern frown on his face. “Your own actions make it hard to believe anything else. To think the Jin would attack their own guest. Have you no honor?!”

“Is there honor in the Hundred Hole’s Curse?” Jin Guangshan asked back, floundering just a little. “If Wei Wuxian had truly cast this on Zixun, we would only be repaying him in kind. The spirits may be presenting their memories, but they can’t know my motivations. Given what role Meng Yao played in all this-”

“If he did play a role, wouldn’t most of that just be in an attempt to earn approval from you?!” Nie Mingjue bit out.

Lan Xichen nodded, adding, “During the conference from two segments ago, you were the one he was protecting.”

But, after receiving that accusation, Jin Guangshan just laughed.

“You two… are you really still making the same mistakes?” he asked. “Sect Leader Nie, Young Master Lan, hasn’t Meng Yao taught you better than to believe so easily? My son is dead now. Meng Yao weaping a few tears when he hears about that doesn’t mean anything more than the tears he shed at your own death, right Nie-zongzhu?”

The man paused, unable to deny it. With Jin Guangshan’s general demeanor, it was easy to want to blame him. However, a habit of adultery did not inherently mean he was responsible for this.

(And besides, throughout the simulation, Nie Mingjue had done a number of things on his own that he couldn’t be proud of.)

(Lan Xichen, always so quick to trust the poor, weak Jin, knew he had no response.)

“You think I wanted my son and heir dead? Be rational for a moment,” Jin Guangshan requested, the blunt words causing both his wife and son to flinch. “Meng Yao wants to become the Sect Leader of the Jin. If he has a chance to kill Zixuan by manipulating both me and Zixun against ‘the enemy of all cultivation sects,’ isn’t that exactly what he would do?”

And, well, that was true…

However-

“Anyone can use the Hundred Holes Curse,” Lan Wangji said. “No matter what Jin Guangyao told you, that would remain true. To contribute to an ambush on your sect’s guest without a proper investigation is still dishonorable no matter what he said.”

It was the first comment from Lan Wangji in quite a while. Jin Guangshan was momentarily taken aback.

Now that the Phoenix Mountain incident was common knowledge, the boy was much harder for him to control.

“...While I understand that Wei Wuxian did not intend what occurred, the fact remains that he killed my son. He was overconfident in his abilities — overconfident in his control. To say that any of us expected this outcome is preposterous." Jin Guangshan countered, then, turning to Wen Ruohan, added, “Your Excellency, isn’t this an absurd-”

“I don’t see any reason to think that.”

Jin Guangshan paused, caught off guard once more.

“Your Excellency?”

“During that conference of yours from a few segments ago, Wei Ying’s seal seemed to get a much bigger focus than his actions. Is the same not true now?”

Jin Guangshan froze, quickly backtracking in his head. Earlier, it had seemed like Wen Ruohan’s annoyance at Jiang Wanyin was the Chief Cultivator’s main takeaway from this whole situation. However, if that guess was wrong...

“Your… Your Excellency, I-”

“This is ridiculous,” Wen Ruohan muttered, turning away. “What A-Ying did or didn’t do isn’t a factor. We all know that.”

How could they not? Hadn’t they seen it from the very first segment? Wei Wuxian, upon waking up in Mo Xuanyu’s body, had observed the practices of the little Lans. He had been surprised to see them setting up Blackwind Flags — spirit attraction flags — flags which he had never allowed the sects to have.

‘Oh, a blackwind flag? All the clans wanted to kill me, yet they use my inventions all the same.’

Jin Guangshan wanted his weapons and inventions but hadn’t been able to get Wei Wuxian’s cooperation. Thus, instead, he cut him off from the Jiang.

That wasn’t enough though. Isolating Wei Wuxian didn’t get the Jin access to his creations. So long as he was alive, he would keep those from them. Even if they got a hold of them, he would never let them know how to use them.

(Wasn’t Xue Yang protected by the Jin precisely because he was willing to take a look at the Yiling Patriarch’s seal?)

Sure, Jin Guangshan probably didn’t want Jin Zixuan dead. He had nothing to gain from that specific factor. There was plenty else he could have been involved in, though.

Wen Ruohan could understand wanting to gain access to resources, but to do that by eliminating their creator — what could be a bigger waste than that?

(If Wen Ruohan hadn’t started the war, hadn’t put the Wen remnants in that situation to begin with, hadn’t gotten himself killed over an altogether meaningless gain, then who knew how many more things Wei Wuxian could have created during the thirteen years he was gone? Someone like that, someone as amazing — as good — as him, should have never been put in a situation like this.)

(They had all, in some way, contributed to this segment.)

(And Wen Ruohan, though long dead by this point, was no exception.)

Still:

“Do all guests of the Jin have to worry about being ambushed like that?” Wen Ruohan wondered. “Or is it only the sons of servants abandoned by their sects?”

Jin Guangshan flushed at those words, but Madam Yu couldn’t allow the blame being sent Jiang Cheng’s way to go unopposed. She stood up, immediately beginning to shout. Jin Guangshan shouted back and Madam Jin and Nie Mingjue chimed in as well.

Meanwhile, Lan Wangji stood still, staring where the illusion of Wei Wuxian had been just moments before. The Yiling Patriarch was just… always so strong, always so brave, always right. He had known to defend the Wens even when no one else would, even if it cost him almost everything he had. He had invented demonic cultivation. He always had some sort of solution or plan no one else could fathom!

'...Can someone tell me… what I'm supposed to do now?'

That hopeless, lost question of his-

"Wangji-xiong," someone whispered.

If Wei Wuxian had just had a bit more help or a bit more time-

"Wangji-xiong!" that person whispered again.

Here, at last, Lan Wangji glanced over. Standing some ways out of the way of the main group, Nie Huaisang was waving at him to come. Next to him, an angry Jiang Cheng and a lost-looking Jin Zixuan stood.

"Come, come," Nie Huaisang hissed, making that beckoning motion once again.

Even an annoyed glare from Lan Wangji wasn't enough to make the Nie heir stop. Eventually, Lan Wangji gave in and walked over.

"What is it?" he asked.

"The adults seem focused on blaming each other. Which, you know, is all good and I'm fine with them doing that, but, in the meantime, let's discuss what we can do better! Not anything super specific; just general rules that will help improve our judgment, you know?"

Lan Wangji, Jiang Cheng, and Jin Zixuan all stared blankly at him. It was hard to tell with Lan Wangji, whose cold gaze looked more disapproving than anything, but the general lack of enthusiasm was more than clear.

"Right, well… I'll start us off, then. Let's aim low and go for 'if Meng Yao seems to be acting strangely and asking him about it makes us want to go somewhere, we bring someone else along!"

"Agreed," Lan Wangji said at once, still vividly recalling the sight of Suihua sticking into Wei Wuxian's gut as a result of Jin Guangyao's machinations. While Jin Ling was the one who wielded the weapon, it was Jin Guangyao who had truly spearheaded its launch.

"Ah, right… okay," Jin Zixuan agreed, nodding. "Then how about… how about, if anyone notices my cousin acting a little weird, they tell me about it right away."

"Yeah, I guess you're probably pretty blind if you didn't notice that all happening until Meng Yao wanted you to."

"I… I-" Jin Zixuan gaped. "You… don't know for sure he was pretending to look stressed."

Nie Huaisang just shrugged, not even trying to argue his point.

(It wasn't really fair of him anyways. He hadn't suspected Meng Yao at all even after Nie Mingjue's corpse was six feet under. And then torn apart, too.)

Jiang Cheng frowned deeper, wondering, "Are we really just going to let him get away with this?"

"We agreed toward the beginning to not punish for events that have yet to occur," Lan Wangji pointed out. "There's no reason to change that now."

(The only exception, in Lan Wangji's mind, being his own future-self's actions at Phoenix Mountain. It was different then. Sure, he hadn't done it himself, but, several times, part of him had wanted to. That temptation he had felt was more than enough to necessitate punishment.)

(Besides, after what Lan Wangji's father may or may not have done, he would take no chances.)

But Jiang Cheng wasn't satisfied yet.

"You think we shouldn't do anything about this? For one, if Jin Zixun's willing to do this to the Jin's guests, who knows what else he's willing to do!"

Nie Huaisang gave a little frown, agreeing, "I guess trying to assassinate an innocent is a lot worse than breaking the rules at the Cloud Recesses, huh? Maybe that should be punished."

"Right!"

"But, Jiang-xiong." Nie Huaisang tilted his head. "Is it really the worst thing we've seen so far?"

Worse than Wen Ruohan starting a war?

Worse than Xue Yang making Xiao Xingchen massacre a village?

Worse than the future Jiang Cheng torturing people he suspected of being Wei Wuxian?

In an instant, all the fight in Jiang Cheng seemed to drain out of him. He looked down, not saying another word.

"Anyways!" Nie Huaisang clapped his hands together. "Back to rules. Any further ideas?"

He looked over at Jiang Cheng, waiting for him to speak.

"Ah, um…" the Jiang heir trailed off, looking rather uncertain. "I think… I think we should… you know…"

The pause lengthened.

"Um…"

He cleared his throat.

(It wasn't as though he couldn't think of anything to say. Rather, he had far too much to say, all of which was far too specific to him. 'Don't declare someone an enemy of all the sects and then be surprised when things start to go wrong for them.' 'If your Shixiong leaves the sect to protect it, offer him a bit more support than a single glimpse at A-Jie's wedding dress.' 'If your brother-in-law dies because the person involved thought Zixuan wanted to kill them, actually explain that to your nephew. If you don't know about that, then at least ask!')

(All these rules were, needless to say, a bit too specific to be useful here.)

"Um… in weird situations we should… try… to remain… calm?"

"Perfect!" Nie Huaisang agreed.

Some ways away, Jiang Yanli's gaze lowered. She, standing with Wen Qing, could hear what they were all saying. Although she wasn't part of the conversation herself, she couldn't help but think on it as well.

Zixuan had probably invited Wei Wuxian for her. She had surely been ecstatic, thinking this was a way she could finally help Wei Wuxian. Showing him her dress was certainly a step, but it wouldn't truly help him. Showing that he had Jin Zixuan's support, however, would. It was a nice thought.

(Unfortunately, in the end, this had fallen into a familiar pattern.)

(Wei Wuxian's first night at Lotus Pier, he had climbed a tree, scared of Jiang Cheng's threat, and only jumped down once Jiang Yanli extended her arms to him. However, given that she was too weak to catch him properly, that had ended with Wei Wuxian hurting his leg.)

(Now, he had climbed up the Burial Mounds, scared of the Great Sects' threats, and only came down once Jiang Yanli extended her arms to him. However, given that she was too weak to protect him properly, that had ended with Zixuan's death and Wei Wuxian's near-loss.)

'Really… every single time…' Jiang Yanli's smile faltered. 'What good does trying to help him do if I only succeed at making everything worse in the end?'

She didn't have an answer.

(But at least she was thinking about it. To be honest, making everyone do that was the only reason Nie Huaisang had brought up this question to begin with. Well, that and keeping everyone from getting too depressed. All in all, it seemed to be going pretty well to him.)

(Besides, now that Meng Yao was involved in all this, getting people to keep a closer eye on him would be that much simpler.)

Jin Ling had been anointed the Sect Leader of the Great Jin Sect. He had received an open invitation from Lan Sizhui several months ago to visit the Lan whenever he wished. He, therefore, had every right to be at the Lan Sect right now.

Despite that, he crept through the sect walkways on his tiptoes, being as quiet as possible to avoid being discovered.

(Luckily, at this time of night, every Lan was bound to already be asleep. The only exceptions would be Lans by marriage like Wei Wuxian, exactly the person he was intending to meet.)

Finally, Jin Ling reached the building he was searching for. A small bit of interior light was visible through the windows, just enough to serve as a reading light for a cultivator's eyes. Every other building was completely dark; this was almost certainly the one. Jin Ling paused, straightened out his robes, and took a deep breath.

It was fine; he had every right to be here and Wei Wuxian had no reason to refuse his request. Besides, even if Wei Wuxian didn't want to answer him, Jin Ling could always try asking his other uncle instead!

(Of course, Jiang Wanyin had been holing himself up in his own sect the past few days, refusing to answer any correspondence from outside. He also wouldn't be able to answer Jin Ling anywhere near as well as Wei Wuxian could. Still, it wasn't completely impossible!)

(He hoped.)

By now, almost a full minute had passed with Jin Ling simply standing outside the door. He had been shifting awkwardly, moving his weight from one leg to the other, but, now, he pulled himself together. Jin Ling slapped his own cheeks a few times, snapping out of his thoughts. He then reached forward, throwing the door open.

"Ah! Jin Ling!" Wei Wuxian squeaked, sitting up. Despite the fact that Wei Wuxian had reassured Jin Ling repeatedly that he never fell asleep at this time of night, he was currently lying in bed with Hanguang-jun.

Without his shirt on.

In fact, despite the fact that blankets covered the lower half of his body, Jin Ling was pretty sure his mother's shidi wasn't wearing any clothes at all.

Alerted by the noise, the imposing form of Hanguang-jun stirred and then sat up, blinking back at Jin Ling as the sleep left his eyes.

His arms looked rather scratched up for a cultivator as powerful as him. Surely wounds like those would heal in less than an hour. Besides that, who would ever be able to get close enough to scratch Hanguang-jun?! Wasn't the Chief Cultivator was too powerful for that?

In his infinite confusion, Jin Ling didn't even notice how Wei Wuxian started turning red the longer Jin Ling stared.

"A-Ling…" Wei Wuxian called. "Is… something wrong?"

Flushing a little at the overly-affectionate address, Jin Ling admitted, “I have a question for you. I was too busy earlier in the day to come.”

“A-ah,” Wei Wuxian nodded. “Of course.”

Jin Ling frowned, feeling more and more like a child seeking out his parents after a nightmare with every second that passed by. His cheeks started to flush, his whole face heating up in shame.

“Sorry, I’ll go!” he rushed out. “Hanguang-jun’s clearly healing from some bad wounds! I’ll- I’ll try to clear my schedule for sometime next week. It’s-”

“No, no, it’s fine,” Wei Wuxian assured him. “Uh, why don’t you head to the dining room? I’ll be right there.”

Jin Ling paused, registering his words, and nearly breathed a sigh of relief. His whole body relaxed, losing tension Jin Ling hadn’t even known was there. Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian leaned over to give Lan Wangji a quick kiss on his head, pushing his husband back into bed.

Less than two minutes later, a now fully-dressed Wei Wuxian walked into the building’s dining room. He sat down across from Jin Ling. A large candle in the center of the table was lit with a quick gesture of his hand, giving the room a soft, warm glow. In direct contrast, a deep, sinking pit seemed to form in Jin Ling’s stomach as he thought about what to say.

“Well then, what can I do for you?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Despite all the thought and preparation he’d put in, Jin Ling felt wholly unprepared for that question.

“I… um-” he swallowed. “I was… I was talking with Lan Sizhui, see? We were talking about lots of things. Important things! I really was busy earlier. He came to visit me while I was working on some paperwork! He apparently had a night hunt nearby, so we weren’t messing around or anything-”

“I believe you, I believe you,” Wei Wuxian assured.

And he did. He had been the one to suggest that job to A-Yuan.

After deactivating the Pingxin Gateway, the very first thing Wei Wuxian did was track down Lan Wangji. Wen Xu — A-Yuan’s father — was something Lan Wangji needed to know. First and foremost because Wei Wuxian had no clue if he’d made the right call. However, after hearing everything Wei Wuxian had to say, Lan Wangji had merely nodded once.

‘I trust your judgment,’ he said. ‘Does Jiang Fengmian know?’

‘I explained the situation him,’ Wei Wuxian nodded. ‘He’ll be keeping us updated on anything he finds out. Wen Ning, too.’

And besides, even if Wen Xu did break their deal, it wouldn’t be the end of the world. If the to-be mother became a hostage, there were quite a few things that could be done in response to that.

Hopefully, that wouldn't be needed.

Nonetheless, Lan Wangji nodded in approval, having no simple suggestions on how to improve the situation. Following that, they called for Lan Sizhui.

'Yes, Hanguang-jun?' the boy had asked, stepping into their room.

'A-Yuan!' Wei Wuxian called out first. 'Come sit, come sit.'

The boy sat.

'I found out something earlier today,' Wei Wuxian revealed. 'It's about your biological father.'

Sizhui sat up at that, his eyes wide.

'Your father's name was Wen Xu. He was the first son of Wen Ruohan.'

And, just like that, Lan Sizhui's spark had seemed to disappear.

'...Oh,' he said.

(He knew who Wen Xu was. Of course he did. The burning of the Cloud Recesses and the Wen heir's death at Nie Mingjue's hands was common knowledge now.)

'...Ah.'

It was a weird thought to have.

'Does that… what does that mean?' Sizhui asked. 'Does that… change anything?'

'Not at all. Not if you don't want it to,' Wei Wuxian assured, reaching across the table to wrap a hand around his. Lan Wangji reached forward as well, wrapping his hand on top of both of them. Sizhui seemed to melt in relief.

'Thank you,' he said. 'For telling me.'

Wei Wuxian nodded. Then, after thinking for a moment more, he said, 'Sizhui, Wen Ning told me he's going on a night hunting trip for a while. He offered to bring you with him.'

(Wen Ning had never known who exactly Sizhui's father was. The war had made the passing of information hard to follow and, after the war, Wen Xu's name was one no Wen could safely speak.)

'You don't have to if you don't feel up to it, but I thought talking to him for a bit might be nice. Otherwise, Lan Zhan did get me a few new gardening tools as a present recently. I've been considering seeing if I can still bury you and Jingyi now that you're all big and strong!'

Lan Sizhui had laughed at that suggestion, the color returning to his cheeks. However, after thinking for a bit more, he shook his head.

'I'd like to talk go with Wen Ning, please,' he requested. 'I haven't gone night hunting with him in a while.'

Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian both nodded in agreement, sending him off with wide smiles and more than a few secretly-packed treats.

Wei Wuxian had known the journey would take them by Lanling, but he hadn't expected Sizhui to speak with Jin Ling, then.

Taking a deep breath, the new Sect Leader continued, "Anyways, Sizhui and I… we were discussing where the simulation might be for those in the past right now. Sizhui tried calculating it out based on how much time we remembered the spirits saying each section would take and he said… he said right about now is when my parents will die."

All the light seemed to leave Wei Wuxian's eyes at once, his gaze turning unnaturally blank for a brief period of time.

"I… Wei Wuxian?"

The Yiling Patriarch glanced back at him. For a moment, instead of Jin Ling, there was someone else standing there:

'A-Li…' Jin Zixuan gasped out. 'A-Li… is still waiting for you… at the Golden Tower… for A-Ling's… one month banquet.'

Despite having no memory of what came after, that one moment was still crystal clear in Wei Wuxian's head.

Jin Ling looked so much like him, these days.

"Wei Wuxian?" the boy asked again, standing up.

"Huh? Ah. No, sit, sit," Wei Wuxian instructed, gesturing for Jin Ling to sit back down. "Sorry about that. I'm following."

However, after that elongated pause, Jin Ling looked more hesitant to speak now than ever before.

"Really, it's fine," Wei Wuxian promised. "I don't know how long the segments are meant to be, but, if he thinks that's the focus right now, I'm inclined to believe him. Is there some sort of a message you want me to try to send the watchers about that?"

"I… I was just — I mean, I was wondering if… it would be possible… for me to see."

Wei Wuxian tilted his head slightly, clarifying, "You want to see your parents?"

"I want to see their deaths."

The chill in the air was heavy. The warm light from the candle on the table was nothing in comparison to the cold air from outside. Jin Ling shivered as the silence once again dragged on.

Wei Wuxian closed his eyes.

Asking a question like ‘Why do you want to do that?’ would be tactless beyond compare. Even without making Jin Ling answer, that would be cruel. Their situations were slightly different, but, if Wei Wuxian were to be given a chance to see what had happened to his parents, he couldn’t confidently say he would refuse.

Still, this was hard to say yes to.

“It’s… not a pleasant sight,” Wei Wuxian said. “Wouldn’t you rather see them together when they’re happy and alive?”

(Not that Wei Wuxian had ever really seen them interact like that. By the time they genuinely got together, he had already left the Jiang Sect. Still, from his few memories of their courting period, he was pretty sure there would be something.)

However, after thinking it over for a moment, Jin Ling shook his head.

“I would… like to see them like that, but part of the point of what we did is that we can now contact the other dimension whenever we want. I can meet them like that, can’t I?” Jin Ling asked. “I’d rather get to know them in person — or as in-person as we can be, at least — instead of just through the simulation. They’re my parents. I should be able to talk to them if I want to!”

Although the last sentence wasn’t asked like a question, Wei Wuxian heard the doubt in there regardless. After the juniors’ plan had been found out (and after the trouble they got in for doing it), a bit of doubt had started working its way into Jin Ling’s head. Their initial attempt had been such an unplanned, spontaneous move and weeks had passed since then without change. What if, after all this, Jin Ling wouldn’t get to meet his parents after all?

But-

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian’s hand wrapped over his own, which had clenched into a fist on the table before them. It was the same position he’d taken with Sizhui not too long ago. Jin Ling looked up, finding a soft, thoughtful smile across from him.

“I’m sure Shijie can’t wait to meet you,” he said. Jin Ling just shrugged, flushing a bit as he looked away.

“Anyways!” He cleared his throat. “I… I want to meet them myself. There’s no need to spy on things they did in the past when I’ll have the real ones soon! It’s just… for the way they died…”

He trailed off, not quite knowing what to say.

“...Do you think it’ll bring you closure?” Wei Wuxian wondered, his voice unusually blank.

“No, that’s not… that’s not what I’m after. It’s not even really about them at all! Not really!”

“It’s for yourself?”

“Yes! No — I don’t know. It’s…”

It wasn’t really about Jiang Yanli or Jin Zixuan or even really Jin Ling.

It was about Wei Wuxian, most of all.

Everyone, all his life, had told Jin Ling that Wei Wuxian was a bloodthirsty murderer — a scoundrel who had betrayed all those who held him dear. ‘Jiang Yanli had treated him like her own brother, and yet Wei Wuxian killed her and Jin Zixuan in cold blood!’ It was a rather clear picture they painted of the scene, leaving no room for any questions.

So long as you didn’t know Wei Wuxian, at least.

‘Jin Guangshan wasn’t pleased about the invitation Senior Wei had received. The former Sect Leader Jin spoke with Jin Zixun, suggesting to him that the banquet could be used as an opportunity to kill Wei Wuxian, meaning… meaning Jin Guangshan wouldn’t have to welcome him to Koi Tower after all.’

Jin Ling had been there when Jingyi read that line out loud. Even now, he didn’t like to think about what it might mean.

After the situation with Jin Guangyao, Wei Wuxian had — officially at least — been forgiven by all. Despite that, people still refused to tell Jin Ling anything that seemed likely to be the truth. They would simply avoid the question, not knowing what to say.

But these were Jin Ling’s parents!

“Shouldn’t I… shouldn’t I get to know?” he asked, turning his gaze down and clenching his hands into fists. “I’ve been hearing about it my whole life. Shouldn’t I get to see? I… did things, I-I-”

Jin Ling had stabbed Wei Wuxian in the gut as revenge.

“I’m involved already, aren’t I?”

Jin Ling had spent years watching his uncle capture countless demonic cultivators as a result of what said uncle had seen Wei Wuxian do. He had even intervened, setting ‘Mo Xuanyu’ free.

Jin Guangyao was apparently involved too, given how he considered Jin Zixuan’s murder to have been partly his doing.

(Not that Jin Ling knew what he meant by that. It was hard when no one would tell him the truth. The cultivation world really liked keeping its dirty little secrets swept under the carpet.)

(And, to people like Wei Wuxian, some memories were too painful to easily bring up.)

But even still-

“I should be able to know. I want to know and I should get to know. I… I… how can I just go about my day not knowing whether or not my parents deserved it?!”

“Deserved it?” Wei Wuxian repeated, snapping out of his thoughts. “What? No, no — a-Ling, no! They didn’t deserve it at all! Your parents were trying to help. Both of them were. It’s just that… I-”

“How am I supposed to know that though?! All everyone says is that you went mad one day and attacked them! Is that what happened? Did you really just go insane? I can’t understand why you would kill them if not for that!”

For a moment, Wei Wuxian was speechless. Beyond simply not knowing what to say — he wasn’t capable of uttering a single sound. Jin Ling did indeed deserve to know what happened to his parents. To not tell him — to allow him to keep some doubt, however little, that his parents were victims was beyond horrible. Wei Wuxian couldn’t do that to anyone, much less his Shijie’s son.

But…

‘A-Li…’ Jin Zixuan gasped out, blood pouring out of the gaping hole in his chest. ‘A-Li… is still waiting for you… at the Golden Tower… for A-Ling’s… one month banquet.’

And, worse than that, Jiang Yanli’s death-

Wei Wuxian shut his eyes.

To show a child something like that…

Sure, as a cultivator, Jin Ling had already seen corpses several times before. However, for years, Wei Wuxian had hoped the newer generation wouldn’t have to experience what they did, growing up in war.

And these would be Jin Ling’s parents-

“...A-Ling,” he said. “I… don’t want you to have to see that.”

“But-”

“But if you… if you really want to, I’ll show you,” Wei Wuxian promised. “In exchange, why don’t you hear what I think happened first. It’ll give you the broader perspective you’re seeking and… and, if that’s not enough, I’ll let you see.”

Jin Ling frowned, clearly dissatisfied with that offer, but, eventually, nodded in agreement.

“Right,” Wei Wuxian said, trying to collect his thoughts. “Right, well…. to start with, your father and I… even from a young age, we’d never really gotten along.”

“Eh?”

“Yeah. I didn’t like how your father… interacted with your mother when we were young.”

It felt strange to tell Jin Ling about the relationship issues Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan had had, but, even after reconsidering, that still seemed like the better option to Wei Wuxian.

Blood gushed from the open wound in Jin Zixuan’s chest, his eyes still wide.

If Jin Ling wanted to see that, he could. But, if that was avoidable…

“Your grandparents on both sides of your family got married due to arranged marriages from their families,” Wei Wuxian continued. “It didn’t fully work out for any of the involved parties. It’s hard to say anyone was happy in that situation. I think, when Jin Zixuan found out he was going to be engaged to your mother, that caused some… complicated feelings for him.”

Pursing his lips together, Jin Ling couldn’t help but wonder, “So he… didn’t love her?”

Some ‘ideal couple’ they were supposed to be-

“He loved her,” Wei Wuxian corrected at once. “Their engagement was dissolved at one point. However, once they actually got to know each other, he genuinely fell in love. I remember… I remember, once, he tried courting her through gifts he’d worked on himself.”

The Jin were known, first and foremost, for their wealth. For him to try to win Jiang Yanli’s heart with his time and effort instead showed more than anything how head over heels he was.

“What did he make?”

“Let’s see… he grew her a lotus in a pot, made a carving for her in the shape of the Jiang Sect’s bell, tried to cook her a meal… I guess, in hindsight, he did a pretty good job of picking things she could actually like.”

“Really?” Jin Ling asked, lighting up.

“Yup. It’s just that, when he gave it to her, the flower wilted, the carving snapped, and the soup only ended up poisoning him,” Wei Wuxian recalled, his expression turning even more fond at those words.

“...Really?” Jin Ling asked again, far less enthusiastic this time.

Wei Wuxian laughed at his reaction, continuing, “Don’t worry about it. Bumbling courtship attempts are just part of growing up. If blood holds true, I’m sure you’ll go through plenty of your own.”

Going bright red, Jin Ling hissed out, “What would you know?! You and Hanguang-jun barely even had a courtship! You two got married before anyone could react! You never got official gifts for each other!”

“Well, Lan Zhan is so obviously perfect. What good would hesitating do in a situation like ours?”

The far-off, dreamy look in his eyes was met with a heavy eye roll. Hanguang-jun was literally one room away; why was Wei Wuxian acting so wistful?!

Jin Ling humphed.

“...I was separated from the Jiang Clan before they officially got together,” Wei Wuxian explained. “There were signs they had interest in each other and the courtship had started, but nothing formal had been announced. A few years later and the two of them had already gotten married. I think they truly loved each other, A-Ling. I just… didn’t get to see much of that.”

The two of them had gone through a similar conversation once before, back when Wei Wuxian was still thought of as ‘Mo Xuanyu.’ Jin Ling had been left unconscious due to Nie Mingjue’s legs. Pulled in by the resentful energy, Wei Wuxian had gotten a chance to tell a younger version of the boy something similar. It felt right, now, to get to tell the current version the same thing.

“Anyways,” Wei Wuxian cleared his throat. “Your mother did everything she could to help me even after I’d separated from the Jiang. She came all the way down to Yiling to show me her wedding dress, if you can believe that. She looked amazing! I don’t know if they spoke about it or not, but your father found out about her feelings. As a result, he invited me to your one-month celebration.”

Jin Ling nodded once. That part of the story was things he already knew. Now, it was time for a split.

“...Wen Ning and I arrived the day of. I’d… wanted to attend the ceremony. However, at Qiongqi path, we were stopped.”

“Stopped? By who?”

“Your father’s cousin, Jin Zixun.”

That name caused a scowl to form on Jin Ling’s face. He knew fairly little about the man, but what he did know wasn’t overly good. The man’s reputation was along the lines of Jin Guangshan's, even if never quite to the same extreme.

“...Why did he stop you?”

“He had received the Hundred Holes Curse. He thought I was the cause.”

Yes, that sounded familiar. In fact, Jin Ling was pretty sure his father’s cousin had died from the Hundred Hole’s Curse. People had told the Jin heir that Wei Wuxian was the cause. People had also told him Wei Wuxian was responsible for days that were too cold and nights that were too long. Besides, if Jin Ling was remembering correctly…

“He died… after you.”

Wei Wuxian nodded.

“You didn’t cause the curse then.”

Wei Wuxian nodded once more.

And it seemed stupid for someone to ambush their sect’s guest just because of that guest’s reputation but, well, could Jin Ling really say that wasn’t possible? He had personally stabbed Wei Wuxian, after all. If that wasn’t a testament to the power of reputation, nothing would be. Before meeting ‘Mo Xuanyu,’ Jin Ling had never questioned the assertion that the Yiling Patriarch had murdered his parents. That was all anyone ever said about him, after all.

(For a moment, a memory of the second siege of the Burial Mounds flashed in Jin Ling’s mind. Thousands of people had gathered together for the sole purpose of taking Wei Wuxian down. Jin Ling’s uncle and Ouyang Zizhen’s father had been among them. If given the chance, they might have also done an ambush.)

But then:

“How many people… were there?”

Wei Wuxian hummed momentarily, thinking back before uncertainly responding, “Two hundred, I think? Maybe three?”

“And it was… just you?”

“And Wen Ning,” Wei Wuxian added.

Jin Ling nodded once.

“Didn’t you summon corpses from the surrounding area? You must have had Chenqing on you, right?”

“They’d cleared out the corpses in the area beforehand. They knew I’d be walking through there.”

Because, as he’d said, it had been an ambush meant to kill. The only reason Wei Wuxian hadn’t died then was that Jin Zixun was too weak to finish the job. If it had been someone else attacking or if Wei Wuxian had been any less capable…

“You were my father’s guest, weren’t you? How could they do that then?!”

Wei Wuxian gave a tired smile, explaining, “Jin Guangshan, Jin Guangyao, and Jin Zixun all worked together to make this happen. I don’t think your father had any idea what was going on. Not until the very end.”

“And… what happened at the end?”

There were a few more seconds of silence.

‘An ambush,’ Jin Ling repeated in his head. ‘Wei Wuxian was ambushed.’

How funny that not a single text Jin Ling had read on the Yiling Patriarch mentioned that side of the equation.

(Guilt started to eat away at him more fiercely than ever before.)

“I wasn’t there myself, but, from what I understand, Jin Guangyao started acting strangely during your ceremony. Your father pried into it and, as a result, came rushing over to us. He tried to tell both sides to stop.”

As Wei Wuxian spoke, memories from that day played clearly in his mind.

“I didn’t trust him. I didn’t think he could make the others stop even if I did and I… thought there was a chance he had invited me there to do this very thing.”

“But he hadn’t, right?!” Jin Ling asked at once. “Did he do that? He couldn’t have!”

“He didn’t,” Wei Wuxian confirmed. “I just… didn’t believe him. Not fully, at least. So, when he marched over to me… I don’t know if I was being careless or tired or overconfident or stupid, but I lost control. Wen Ning served as the weapon, but I was the one who delivered the killing blow. Jin Ling… A-Ling, I…”

He paused, swallowed once, then bowed his head.

“I’m sorry,” he said. “It was my mistake. I never meant for that to occur. Your father did nothing wrong.”

And that, right there, was exactly what Jin Ling had wanted to hear. He didn’t want his father to be evil. He didn’t want his parents to deserve what had happened to them. He, for years, had wanted their killer to be someone he could easily hate.

And yet, after hearing this truth, what could he say? ‘I’m sorry for what Jin Zixun did?’ ‘If the fourteen year old version of me who hadn’t met you yet had the chance to, I probably would have been there to ambush you too?’

For years, there had been no one who hated demonic cultivators as much as Jin Ling. The only true exception was Jiang Cheng, but even he wouldn’t be able to manage the single-minded, naive hate of a literal child. Jin Ling had hated every single one of them for their connection to Wei Wuxian.

“You were… ambushed,” he muttered again.

(As much as he hated to say it, when taking into account everything that had happened since Wei Wuxian’s return, an answer like that made far too much sense.)

“Wait, but then… what about my mom?” he asked. “What happened with her?”

Wei Wuxian’s expression faltered once more, his eyes watering in grief. Despite that, the smile he sent Jin Ling was nothing but genuine.

“Right…” he muttered. “Right, I should tell you about her too.”

Every word seemed to cause him a near-physical pain but he pushed through. Jin Ling clenched his teeth together, wishing the experience was over already and yet determined to see it to the end. He had to find out why that had happened to his parents.

And, in the process, maybe he could come to understand his uncles a little more.

Chapter End Notes

Terribly painful chapter. By far the most painful part was trying to write a scene in which Jin Zixuan and Jin Zixun talk to each other without losing track of whose name belongs to whom XD

Also, in case it wasn’t clear, I’m following the novel’s canon for Wei Wuxian’s responsibility in this scene, not the donghua’s or live action’s. I love both those adaptations, but I felt like deviating from the novel was implying that MXTX’s justification for the scene wasn’t enough, which I don’t think is at all true. Thus, ‘it was an accident’ is what we’re going with.
:)

The End

Chapter Notes

Not the actual last chapter, btw! Just seemed like a fitting title!

Thanks again, Tintin!

Chicken. Salt. A crunch of greens.

A mouthwatering smell wafted through the air.

“Seriously? For free?” someone asked.

“Uh huh. Apparently they’re with the YunmengJiang Sect, looking for people who have the potential to be cultivators. In exchange for letting them test you, they’re giving out dumplings for free!”

News like that could travel quickly in small towns. Among beggars, it traveled even faster.

A young boy, whose hands had a total of nine fingers rather than ten, looked up. His stomach growled.

“Let’s go!” someone said. The crowd rushed over.

Rumors of this had been spreading for the past few days. 重试, the Chong Shi Union, was a new organization established by the head disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect. Their first buildings had been set up just a few days ago. Word spread quickly after that.

‘It makes sense,’ people had said. ‘Just look how powerful the sect has gotten since the great sleep. Even the Wen seem to be supporting them. That head disciple of theirs… despite who his father is, he’s accomplished quite a bit in recent days. I’m sure they’re simply trying to expand their influence now.’

It made sense to the general public. There were a few elements of mystery, a few sources of intrigue, and it was likely to affect the political balance in the coming years. Everyone wanted to see what would occur.

“Alright! Line up here!”

The purple uniform the speaker was wearing was more than enough to ensure compliance. When the silver bell by their side was added to the equation, it would be hard to find any civilians willing to disobey. As such, despite A-Luo’s youth, he could be tasked with directing people to the back of the line just fine. His sister, on the other hand, was tasked with walking along the line with A-Yu, making sure no scuffles or cheating occurred. One by one, every youth in the town fell into place. The dumplings were being handed out in front of an easily identifiable one story wooden structure. Within the structure, several voices could be heard:

“Are you sure I shouldn’t help out?”

“Positive, Young Master Wei. Please, feel free to keep supervising for now,” Meng Yao said. His hands moved quickly, filling and folding new dumplings at a break-neck pace. Wen Ning scurried from side to side, making more filling and checking to ensure the in-progress ones were still in need of cooking.

“I really think this would be easier with three-”

“Maybe you should go see if the evaluations are going well,” Wen Ning cut in. “I-I know you trained Young Master Wong and Young Lady Xin and-and I’m sure they can handle supervising the test, but you’re still their shixiong, right?”

“Wen Ning, too?!” Wei Wuxian gaped. “You know, I can make dumplings with less spice-”

“What you consider ‘less spice’ is going to kill one of those five year olds. I am not dealing with a corpse tonight,” Meng Yao declared.

(Wei Wuxian was technically his boss and most certainly his superior, but talking to him like this was what worked best. Being overly polite or humble got met with amusement and any flattery got brushed off just as easily. By now, speaking informally had just become second nature.)

“Yao-gege, don’t you think you’re being too harsh?”

“We need to maintain a good reputation for your plan, Young Master. No need to take any needless risks,” Meng Yao declared, chopping onions just a bit faster. The staff and chefs Wei Wuxian had hired would arrive in a few days. For now, Meng Yao and Wen Ning could handle this; there was no need for him to get involved.

And yet, at that moment, a hand started inching toward the ingredients for the filling.

Wack!

Meng Yao smacked it away at once.

“Young Master!” Wen Ning complained, moving to physically block Wei Wuxian off from the ingredients. “Please…please don’t!”

(Meng Yao moved rapidly, quickly moving all the spices out of Wei Wuxian’s line of sight.)

(Yes, both he and Wen Ning knew they were being a little ridiculous. However, anyone who hadn’t tasted Wei Wuxian’s cooking had no right to talk. Spice of that intensity shouldn’t be possible, much less edible! If it weren't for Jiang Fengmian's lack of reaction, Meng Yao would have thought the demonic cultivation had killed off Wei Wuxian's taste buds!)

(Luckily, even Wei Wuxian couldn't resist Wen Ning's pleadings for long.)

"Alright, alright." Wei Wuxian gave in, rubbing dramatically at the hand Meng Yao had smacked. "Fine, I'll go check on how the tests are going. Call me if you need anything, okay? Especially if someone from the Jin sect shows up again."

Though Jin Zixun had been sent back quite dishonorably, many of his subordinates had come over in recent days. Wei Wuxian hadn't figured out yet if they were causing trouble on their own or under his orders, but it was annoying nonetheless.

"Anyways, I'll be back soon. Keep up the good work!" he said. With that last order, Wei Wuxian reached over, ruffling the hair on both their heads. Both Wen Ning and Meng Yao froze. Right as Wei Wuxian left the room, he saw blush of an identical shade of red on both their cheeks. His laughter only made the color deepen.

The walls of their new base of operations were made of a light pine, the large openings letting in plenty of light. The rooms within the compound were rotating out groups of children, teenagers, and adults, all of whom were asked to take the same test in exchange for the dumplings. Wei Wuxian had designed the test himself, ordering his shidi and shimei to state the questions orally and repeat them whenever asked. A few hypothetical situations would be described, many of which were ones Wei Wuxian had experienced himself. Test answers, on the other hand, could be in both written and drawn form — or even spoken, if that was how the participant wanted to respond. People who would give up hours of the day for a few measly dumplings were likely to be beggars. Assuming literacy was not likely to generate many results.

Wei Wuxian peaked past through an ajar door, getting a glimpse of a test in progress.

"...the merchant then turns to you. 'Brat, are you the one who stole my goods?!' he shouts. There is no time to hide or put away the jewelry by your feet. What do you do?" Wong Mifan read aloud, just as Wei Wuxian had instructed him to do. There was a frantic flurrying of hands, many children forgoing the brushes altogether and using their fingers to draw out their responses. Wei Wuxian smiled.

Technically speaking, the test was of almost no importance at all. Neither literacy nor historical knowledge could be expected of the ones being tested and knowledge of the six arts (rites, music, archery, equestrianism, calligraphy, and mathematics) were even less likely to be found. Officially, this test was just a cover-up so that a young boy of the right age with nine fingers could be found. 'They're looking for people with the potential to be cultivators' was just speculation by the public. In actuality, it would have been far more efficient to have built a traveling stall instead. Permanent structures were excessive and a needless expense.

However…

Their job, here, was to guide Xue Yang onto the right path, identifying and saving him so that the future would not come to pass. That was their only goal. The sects as a whole would benefit from it.

(Did the crimes Xue Yang would commit in the future really mean that he was more worthy of receiving help than any other?)

Jiang Fengmian had given Wei Wuxian a substantial amount of funds for this operation. Wei Wuxian had even checked a few times, making sure that he could use everything he'd been given. It was an opportunity like no other.

The test Wei Wuxian had made took a while. It required thought and patience and rewarded creativity. If young beggars were willing to come back and do this day after day for just a few dumplings…

Maybe, eventually, Wei Wuxian could set something up that helped them learn a few things too.

(When she woke up, Jiang Yanli would surely want to make food for the kids herself. Wei Wuxian hoped she would get the chance to.)

'Shijie will probably want to make them all soup, huh?' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Maybe Uncle Jiang and I should pre-order a bunch of bowls for her.'

Though, come to think of it, there was a more important conversation with Jiang Fengmian that Wei Wuxian should probably have first:

'Wait, Wen Xu has a son?!'

'W-well, not yet,' Wen Ning clarified. 'In the future! In the far-future. That son is one of the kids that initiated the Great Sleep! Remember what you were saying about the traces? About unknown souls becoming attached to some people in the past? That's them! The souls of the five who did that attached to their parents in the past! One of them was Wen-gongzi's son!'

Wei Wuxian stared a little longer, eyes wide, then asked, 'Wait, so… someone who was involved in all this… is my kid?'

Wen Ning nodded rapidly. One of the traces had landed on Jiang Yanli, one on Jin Zixuan, one on Lan Ziming, one on Wen Xu, one on Sect Leader Ouyang, one on his wife, and one on Wei Wuxian. They hadn't tracked all of them down yet, but the implications of the ones that had been found so far seemed to support Wen Ning's claim.

'But… Mo Xuanyu's signature fused with me,' Wei Wuxian pointed out.

(Mo Xuanyu was already born.)

(Wei Wuxian was just fifteen.)

'W-well… maybe it's more complicated than it seems? Maybe… maybe Mo Xuanyu was just too young or something? So it found someone close to him?'

It was hard to say.

‘Young Master Wei, please focus,’ Meng Yao requested, setting down the small mountain of scrolls he had been carrying. ‘If you want us to finish setting up this office before nightfall we’re going to have to work quickly.’

‘We can talk and work at the same time, Meng Yao. Don’t worry so much,’ Wei Wuxian had said, smiling brightly. He then reached over, picking up two large stone benches and placing them on either side of the hall.

This was the second building they had furnished today, but, even now, Meng Yao couldn’t help but gape a little whenever he saw Wei Wuxian exhibit such casual feats of strength. Hopefully he would get used to being around cultivators soon.

‘Okay, so go on, Wen Ning,’ Wei Wuxian cued, slipping outside to drag in the large central table he’d been storing in the street. ‘Wen Xu and Mo Xuanyu decided to hold off on finding the others with the trace until later, right? And Mo Xuanyu’s giving him instructions on a compass that can detect resentful energy?’

‘That’s what he said,’ Wen Ning confirmed, sweeping the floors. ‘To-to be honest, I’m still confused about most of what they were saying. It seems like it all worked out though.’

Meng Yao hummed, storing the scrolls away on shelves just above a few blank books. The more Wen Ning described the strange conversation, the more Meng Yao wished he’d gotten to hear it for himself.

‘Maybe we should go looking for her… for the to-be mother,’ Meng Yao suggested. ‘Even if not now, that seems like information that will be valued later.’

‘We can, but that might take us a little while,’ Wei Wuxian pointed out. ‘I hired the townspeople around Yunmeng, Qinghe, and Lanling to make us a bunch of these buildings. They’re not too complicated, so all the groups managed to finish faster than I’d expected them to. We’ve got a lot more furnishing to do.’

Meng Yao and Wen Ning both winced, looking around the large, dusty hall.

‘How… how many?’ Wen Ning wondered.

‘Thirteen more! Fifteen in total!’ Wei Wuxian responded with far too much cheer, ducking under the table to sweep out the dust it had brought in.

Neither Wen Ning nor Meng Yao could say anything in response.

‘Oh, don’t worry so much about it. Isn’t it more fun to be out and about than to stay behind a desk all day?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Trust me: this is good for you two!’

Wen Ning couldn’t help but feel like his sister would probably agree. Resigning himself to his fate, he picked up the broom again and got back to work. Meng Yao, meanwhile, just gave a short, disbelieving laugh. This wasn’t really what he was expecting when he agreed to work for Wei Wuxian.

Still, despite the building's large size, it was at least pretty plain for a construction project funded by a major sect. It consisted of only four rooms — the sect had merely touched up the building that had been here before. High-level strengthening and warding talismans lined the walls but, otherwise, this appeared to be a perfectly normal hall. If all went as planned, the fifteen newly-constructed testing sites would be in perfect condition to test the potential of fifteen towns worth of people.

Officially speaking, at least.

'...How would you two describe Mo Xuanyu?' Meng Yao asked, filling up a second shelf with books. 'He's a demonic cultivator, isn't he?'

'Technically, I'm probably one too.'

'I didn't mean any disrespect!' Meng Yao assured at once. 'I'm just… surprised it's as respected in the future as he implied it to be. Do you really think he was being honest about that?'

'Hm… 70-30 in his favor?' Wei Wuxian supposed. 'He knows a lot of people I know and none of them disparage demonic cultivation. He even brought the future Jiang Cheng to speak to me once! That was wild.'

'Does he know your future-self, then?'

'Oh, did I not mention?' Wei Wuxian glanced back. 'Apparently my future-self is long dead.'

The broom that had been in Wen Ning's hands fell to the floor, clattering loudly.

'Ah, sorry!' he squeaked, picking it up at once. 'Sorry. Sorry.'

He… did not love being reminded of the future Wei Wuxian's fate.

'...I'm sorry for bringing it up,' Meng Yao said, turning to face Wei Wuxian at once. 'I swear I-'

'Oh, it's fine, it's fine. It's not painful or anything; that's essentially all I know about it,' Wei Wuxian revealed. 'To be honest, I'd almost completely forgotten until now. I should probably ask for more details, huh?'

'...Probably,' Meng Yao supposed as Wen Ning nodded rapidly in the background. The person in question gave a lackadaisical shrug, getting back to work. Meng Yao sighed. He had experience working for all sorts of different people. None of them had ever managed to catch him off guard as consistently as Wei Wuxian.

Sweeping hurriedly, Wen Ning wondered aloud, 'Do you think the Sect Leaders will know? They're seeing a lot of the future, right? Maybe you'll come up.'

'Maybe. Uncle Jiang has been acting a little strange around me recently,' Wei Wuxian supposed. 'Hehe. Shijie was probably pretty excited to see my future self. She'll definitely tell me about it if I ask her to!'

Wei Wuxian shook himself out of the memory then smiled to himself, content. He would ask Jiang Fengmian about his future self if he had a chance to and, if neither of them had time for that, he would just wait for Jiang Yanli to wake up. She could tell him everything she learned, then.

He hoped his death hadn't upset her too much.

Well, in any case, Jiang Cheng could surely tell him-

Clink!

Wei Wuxian paused.

The sound had been faint enough that a non-cultivator would have had no chance of hearing it. Wei Wuxian turned in the direction of the noise. It was behind the wall he had just passed, sounding as though it had come from above the one-story hall.

'The roof?' Wei Wuxian wondered. He silently stepped out of the building and jumped up. On the roof, Wei Wuxian spotted a small, black-clothed bundle trying futilely to sneak across the roof's clinking tiles. Wei Wuxian watched for several seconds, unnoticed, as the boy's antics continued. He was small and thin, and Wei Wuxian estimated his age as seven or eight, taking into account the lack of nutrition he'd probably grown up with. Size wise, he was no larger than your average five-year-old, allowing him to pull himself up to a higher level on the delicate tiles without breaking them under his weight. However-

Slip-

Polished smooth as they were, the roof's tiles offered very little traction. The boy's hands slipped off them, sending him falling back to the ground far below. For a moment, the boy seemed stunned.

Then, he registered what was going on and let out a scream!

Yank!

His fall stopped abruptly, a mere second after it began. The boy blinked once, realizing he was being held up by a hand holding the back of his shirt. He glanced back.

"Hi there," Wei Wuxian greeted. "You know, if you wanna climb our roof, I recommend you do it later in the day. It gets misty at night, so the tiles are all going to be too slippery if you try it now."

The boy paled instantly, realizing he'd been caught. That hesitation didn't last for long however. He started kicking and flailing at once, trying to get out of Wei Wuxian's grip.

"Now, now," the head disciple laughed, blocking all the incoming attacks. "If you flail around too much, you might slip out of my grip and start falling again. Give me a sec."

With that, he wrapped his arm around the boy's back and pulled him over his shoulder, jumping off to reach the ground in one easy hop. Once he landed, he held the child out again, wondering if the flailing would resume. Instead, a fearful look was sent his way.

“You’re a cultivator,” the boy observed.

Wei Wuxian nodded once.

“You… are you from the Jiang Sect?”

“I am,” Wei Wuxian confirmed.

“What do you want from me?”

Grinning, Wei Wuxian responded, “I guess, first and foremost, I’d like to know why you were sneaking around up there. Aren’t you a bit young for a career in espionage?”

“I’m eight!” the child protested, swinging at Wei Wuxian. “I don’t need your help! Go away!”

His arms were thin. Far thinner than they should be.

“Have you had a chance to get some of our dumplings yet?”

The boy paused for a moment, desire filling his eyes. Even now, the smell of Wen Ning and Meng Yao’s work inside spread out throughout the compound. If the boy had successfully continued in the direction he had been going, he would have ended up at the kitchens soon enough. The child’s breaths came out shakily. He swallowed once.

But-

“Let me go.”

“Hm?”

“Let me go!” the boy shouted again. His arms were trembling as he raised them. Not much time had passed, but the swinging he’d done had already left him too exhausted to move.

“Did the line seem too long?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Put me down!”

“Did you know about the service we’re offering?”

Another swing, even weaker than the ones before, was sent Wei Wuxian’s way.

“Did something push you out of the line? Or did you leave by yourself? We’re not requiring payment, you know.”

“Ha! Like I’d believe that!”

“Oh?”

The boy huffed a few times, already out of breath, but glared just as fiercely as before.

“Adults always lie,” he growled. “And you cultivators always think you’re better than us! Food for free as long as we do a ‘test’ for you? I don’t know what you’re planning, but I’m not as stupid as all of them! I’m not helping you with anything!”

“Alright then.”

“Eh?”

Wei Wuxian set the child down. In his confusion, he didn’t try to run. He simply stared, wide-eyed, as Wei Wuxian reached into his robes and pulled out a bamboo leaf wrapping. As soon as it was unfolded, a sharp smell emanated out.

Spice. Salt. Meat.

“...Dumplings?” the child asked.

Wei Wuxian set the bundle down on the floor, taking one of them and munching away at it happily. The boy stared and stared and stared. Then, Wei Wuxian took another one. Then another.

The child’s mouth watered at the sight.

Finally, keeping his weight back so he could run at a moment’s notice, the child reached forward and snatched one of the dumplings. He brought it close, stared at it skeptically, then bit into it.

He spit it out immediately and threw the dumpling on the ground, coughing heavily.

Silently, Wei Wuxian handed over a small container of water. The boy pushed it away, quickly backing up.

“Did… did you poison this?!”

“Of course not. It’s just a bit of spice; you’re fine,” Wei Wuxian assured him, picking the remainder of the bun off the ground and biting into it himself. “My companions told me we couldn’t give these out to anyone and made me take them all with me. They’re being completely ridiculous, don’t you agree?”

In a few more bites, he finished the bun the boy had just rejected, licking his lips once he was done.

For several more seconds, the child simply stared. There was some chance that whatever had been put into the dumplings just didn’t affect the cultivator across from him. There was some chance, on top of that, that eating the buns would put him into the other’s debt — that this man would demand something in exchange for the food being given.

But…

With every one Wei Wuxian ate, more drool pooled in the child's mouth. Moving silently, he reached forward to grab another one.

'If he tries to make me do something in exchange, I'll kick him in the crotch and run away,' he assured himself. Then, at least, he bit in. The spice burned, but the taste of actual food after so long was enough to make the child scramble for more.

Wei Wuxian smiled at the sight. His eyes, however, zeroed in on the child's outstretched hand.

'A crushed pinky finger,' he thought. 'Not as uncommon as it should be. We've had a few false positives thus far.'

But the future's Mo Xuanyu was pretty sure their target had been living in this district at around this time.

The gender matched. So did the age.

"What's your name, kid?" Wei Wuxian asked.

The boy, cheeks stuffed full with dumplings despite the tears the spice was bringing to his eyes, looked up.

"...Xue Yang," he admitted once the food had been swallowed.

"It's nice to meet you, Xue Yang. My name's Wei Ying, courtesy name Wei Wuxian."

Twenty years into the future, long after Xue Yang's death, a pair stepped onto a flat ledge. Under the afternoon sun, the rocks of Qishan seemed to glow.

(If Lan Jingyi was here, he would have complained endlessly about the heat.)

The dark stone reflected light to a near-blinding degree, completely at ends with the fog-filled lands of Gusu. Lan Sizhui's heavy robes were unsuited for the current climate but, in the name of Lan Qiren, Sizhui refrained from removing the outer layer.

Luckily, as the cliff got steeper and steeper, Wen Ning began handling the most difficult parts of their journey. As a fierce corpse, Sizhui's uncle remained mostly unaffected by the raging sun, able to reach the top without any obvious exertion.

"Thank you, Uncle," Lan Sizhui said as he was set down. He closed his eyes for a moment and breathed in, tasting the air.

Unlike the Cloud Recesses, high in the isolated, lush forests of Gusu, the land that was once known as 'The Nightless City' was surrounded by steep, rocky cliffs and barren plains. The cliffs, as Sizhui had learned once, were originally viewed as a strong defense against enemy attacks, leading many people to gather to start their lives here. The height wouldn't do much to stop cultivators, of course, but, at the start of Qishan's creation, the ability to fly on swords had not been discovered yet.

(Even demonic cultivation, something that seemed as basic a part of the world as the Cloud Recesses itself, was only created toward the end of Wen Ruohan's reign.)

Inhaling the warm air, Lan Sizhui looked up.

'A cloudless sky.'

(The opposite of Gusu. It was warm. Too warm, in many ways.)

The sun burned bright, practically searing Lan Sizhui's face. He raised an arm to cover his head.

(Hanguang-jun had the symbol of the Wen Sect branded onto his skin. From what Sizhui had heard, Wei Wuxian used to, too.)

A breeze swept by but only brought more heat, nearly scalded Sizhui's skin. Meanwhile, Wen Ning stood to Sizhui's side, looking down on what seemed to be the leftovers of a wooden shack. Sizhui looked down as well, taking note of the faded paint from years past. The sight didn't seem to match the expression on Wen Ning's face. Even subdued as the corpse's facial movements had to be, the small smile on his face was easy to see. Upon noticing Sizhui's inquisitive gaze, Wen Ning looked toward him and his smile widened even more.

"There used to be a stall here," he explained. "It was right at the outskirts of the main road, so everyone coming to and leaving the Nightless City would pass by. I don't remember it all that well, but, according to my sister, I got separated from her one day when I was three. I'd gotten distracted by something or taken the wrong turn. The stall owner noticed me wandering around and gave me some food until A-Jie managed to find me. I'd loved the buns here ever since."

Wen Ning couldn't eat anything now, much less this. As Lan Sizhui looked down on the few remaining boards and twigs, he felt a strange feeling come over him.

'The stall owner surely fled Qishan before the war reached here. Leaving that aside, Sect Leader Lan and the former Sect Leader Nie were always against taking non-Wen civilians as prisoners. If the owner is dead now, it probably isn't a direct result of the war.'

And yet…

'There were people here. People who lived here, selling buns day by day.'

The thought was obvious. Laughably so.

'There were people here whom Uncle Wen loved — people Xian-gege lived with for years.'

Slowly, Sizhui turned his gaze toward the large, towering pile of stone in the distance. Once, it had been the palace at the center of Qishan. Sect Leader Wen had lived there. The Sect Leader's sons had lived there. Lan Sizhui's father had lived there.

Wen Ruohan's actions had turned it into this.

‘Father,’ Lan Sizhui thought, internally wincing at how that word sounded in his head. ‘Wen Xu… Young Master Wen…. What were you thinking when Wen Ruohan did all this? Would you have changed your actions knowing how this ends?’

(And what about the other version — the one in the alternate timeline Sizhui had created? What would that Wen Xu do now that he knew?)

The heat of the sun weighed heavily on them.

The pair walked forward, journeying past the charred remains of what was once the greatest city in the world. Some might have looked at this and felt saddened by the loss. Others, having grown up with stories of the Sunshot Campaign, might cheer. Though Sizhui could understand that on a conceptual level, he, despite standing here now, just felt distant from it all.

“Uncle?” Sizhui called out. “Did you… know anything around this section? Did you know anyone on this street?”

As if having expected the question, Wen Ning nodded once, pointing a little behind them at a small clearing without any traces of the buildings that might have been there once.

“A small garden was put together by some of the children around here,” Wen Ning explained. “Aunt Qian let them use her yard. They were even growing some medicinal herbs. I went to pick some up for A-Jie every once in a while.”

“Really?” Lan Sizhui asked, giving the patch a closer look. “And what about that area?”

“There used to be a library over there.”

“What about there?”

“A weaponsmith,” Wen Ning said. “I actually got my bow made by that shop owner’s son.”

Lan Sizhui’s eyes seemed to sparkle a little as he took everything in.

However, the further up they went — the closer to the main buildings of the Wen Sect they got — the less Wen Ning had to say.

“What about here?”

“There was… well, I suppose there was a restaurant over there,” Wen Ning admitted, pointing a few charred buildings down the block.

“Did you go there often?” Sizhui wondered.

“No, no. Young Master Wen — Wen-er-gongzi, Wen Chao, not your father — liked to go there often. I… tried to stay away.”

“...Ah.”

Further questions went much the same way:

“A brothel Wen-er-gongzi liked to visit was near here.”

“Wen-er-gonzi was in charge of the divisions that went this way-”

“This is fairly close to his favorite bar, so-”

All the way through to the palace.

“The sect did its training here, right?” Sizhui asked. “You must have come here often.”

“No, I actually did most of my training in one of the branches with A-Jie,” Wen Ning said. “We’re distantly related to Wen Ruohan, so it wasn’t that hard for A-Jie to keep me away.”

(Wen Chao knew him by reputation, but, at the archery competition, had to ask someone for his name. That was one of the few interactions they’d had; Wen Qing had done a truly impeccable job of keeping him safe.)

(Until the war, at least.)

(Wen Ning wished he’d been able to do the same for her.)

“We only came here when we were summoned,” he continued. “Wen-er-gongzi aside, she desperately wanted me to avoid Wen Ruohan’s gaze.”

Because Wen Ruohan had started a war, massacred thousands of cultivators, and destroyed countless sects in a mad bid to gain more power than he already had. He was evil.

(They said that about the Yiling Patriarch, too.)

Lan Sizhui paused for a bit, staring blankly at the once-towering sect walls which now laid directly in front of him, and asked, “I know you… tried to avoid him, but… what did you think of Wen Ruohan? Before the war started; back when he was just your sect leader.”

Wen Ning paused for a few seconds, not hesitant — mostly just unsure of how to answer. So many of his thoughts on the man were based on things that happened after the war began.

But from the beginning-

“He scared me,” Wen Ning admitted. “I mostly knew him by reputation, but A-Jie had met with him a few times. She always seemed so tired when she came home.”

They walked up the palace steps, taking care to not step where the stone had caved in. Weather had worn it down over decades and bandits and thieves had long since looted the palace for everything that was left. Anything that had been in the treasury belonged to the remaining Great Sects now.

(The experience had when walking through the city was completely different from trying to fly overtop. Hanguang-jun had been right when he’d suggested they travel by foot.)

“Oh, look! Over there. On the rocks!” Wen Ning called out abruptly. “The clan’s symbol is still engraved there.”

And indeed, there it was: a large carving of the sun etched into the stone. It had faded somewhat over the years, but the shape was still easy to recognize.

“I once saw the Sect Leader there, I think,” Wen Ning recalled. “A conference was held. Wen Ruohan wasn’t pleased that day, though, so A-Jie took me away pretty quickly.”

Lan Sizhui took the sight in, trying to envision what his grandfather might have looked like standing there, that day.

“...Was he often mad?”

That seemed to fit his reputation, at least.

“Maybe?” Wen Ning supposed. “Or… frustrated might be a better way to describe him. Whenever I saw him, he always seemed annoyed at what the people around him had done.”

Wen Chao had been a frequent source of frustration. The rest of the sect, too. At that time, the Wen Sect had been a force roughly equivalent to the other four great sects combined. The Nightless City’s population had been equivalently gargantuan. Life there was very different from life in Gusu.

Reaching a flatter area of the trek up, Wen Ning and Lan Sizhui passed by a pile of rubble containing a much lighter wood than the rest of the city. Beech, as Wen Ning recalled.

“There used to be a medical office here,” the fierce corpse explained. “The few times I saw him… Sect Leader Wen was only ever happy when A-Jie had accomplished something new.”

“Huh?” Lan Sizhui turned toward him, gaping just slightly. “Oh. I…”

He paused for a moment longer.

“...Really?”

“Yes,” Wen Ning nodded once more. “I didn’t see him much, but he often came personally to see what she had done. That was always stressful for A-Jie.”

Wen Ruohan had never cared about whether he was making her uncomfortable. Her research, on the other hand, was of the highest priority.

Even now, Wen Ning still didn’t really understand why Wen Ruohan had started the war. The supervisory offices the sect had tried to set up were essentially a declaration of conquest. Broken pride as the result of previous incidents could be a cause, but even that felt too short-sighted. The incident with the Xuanwu of Slaughter was inevitable, given who Wen Ruohan had left in charge. The sect’s embarrassment during the archery competition was more of the start, but that wasn’t fully right either.

Wen Ning stepped up the last step, reaching an area with the shattered remains of what had once been Wen Ruohan's throne. The Sect Leader's seat was barren now, the barely-identifiable structure left shattered and useless. All the paintings that had lined the walls were taken or burnt to ash decades ago.

Wen Ning had never once been able to look up and meet his Sect Leader's eyes.

As he looked down now, the throne he had feared so strongly appeared brittle and frail.

(If someone else had been sect leader, would the Wen Sect still be around? Or would they have met their end even sooner, the great power falling to the foolishness of someone like Wen Chao instead?)

(Though, come to think of it, he wasn't Wen Ruohan's only son.)

"Your father-"

He cut off.

Lan Sizhui glanced over, waiting for Wen Ning to continue. The fierce corpse made a meaningless show of clearing his throat.

"Your father was…"

A pause again. If Wen Ning still possessed a living body, he would have been fidgeting like mad.

"Young Master Wen, he… isn't someone I knew very well," Wen Ning admitted. "I was scared of him, too. He always seemed a lot like Wen Ruohan."

Though Wen Ruohan himself, from what Wen Ning had heard, never seemed to agree.

"Wen Xu was the one who led the attack on the Cloud Recesses, wasn't he?" Lan Sizhui asked.

"He was," Wen Ning agreed.

"He burned the sect down, killing Zewu-jun and Hanguang-jun's father in the process, right?"

Wen Ning nodded once more.

"...Do you know why?"

After a moment of hesitation, Wen Ning was forced to confess, "No. I didn't know him personally."

(The Lan sect didn't know him that well either. Wen Xu only occasionally spoke at conferences, much better at holding his tongue than Wen Chao had ever been. He hadn't even been at the archery competition that led to the attack. He wasn't involved in the Xuanwu of Slaughter incident either. If he was offended by the Lan, it was only indirectly.)

"...Wen Ruohan ordered him to," Wen Ning said. "He might have not needed more reason than that."

The answer was based on conjecture, speculation, rumor, and reputation. Lan Sizhui knew that what he'd been told was far from a complete answer. However, right now, it was probably the most accurate picture anyone could give.

The Wen had been powerful and great.

Some people in Qishan had been kind.

Some of the Wen were not.

The people here had been people, just like with anywhere else.

They weren't people Sizhui knew, however.

'The remnants of the Wen Sect who helped raise me in the Burial Mounds… those people are family. Uncle Wen, Xian-gege, Uncle Wen's sister, Hanguang-jun — those people are family to me.'

And Wen Xu, who had done things Sizhui couldn't possibly agree with — who felt like just as much of a mystery as before?

'If I… have a chance to get to know the version of him in the other timeline, I don't see any reason to turn that down. I'd like to speak with him, at the very least.'

However-

"Uncle Wen?" Sizhui said.

As he looked over, the unbearably hot sun of Qishan pressed down upon Sizhui, feeling completely alien when compared to the serene, fog-filled lands of Gusu.

(It was quiet here. Despite the lack of people, there were far fewer animals in Qishan than there were around the Cloud Recesses. It was quite different from home.)

Did Sizhui want to know more about the Wen? Certainly. He wanted to know more about the bun seller who took care of Wen Ning, the auntie who allowed children to use her home as a garden, the young boy who crafted Wen Ning's bow — he wanted to learn about Wen Qing, "Granny Wen," "Uncle Four," and everyone else Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning had mentioned to him.

The people who had once lived in this palace, so separated from the rest of the world, didn't hold his interest anywhere near as much.

And thus, smiling brightly, Lan Sizhui looked up at Wen Ning.

“I think I’m ready to go home,” he said.

And, at those words, the fierce corpse finally seemed to relax. He nodded once.

“I’m sure Hanguang-jun and Wei-gongzi have been missing you,” he said.

If Jiang Yanli heard the name “Wei Wuxian” spoken aloud one more time she was fairly certain she was going to cry. It would be a rather poor reaction to have considering who she was surrounded by, but, after everything they had seen together, the gathered crowd wasn’t likely to comment on that.

Either way, that didn’t stop her from sucking in a breath of air when the world darkened anew.

Black was all that could be seen. For a moment, it seemed like the simulation hadn’t yet begun. However, over time, the watchers’ eyes adjusted to the low level of light, allowing them to see Wei Wuxian’s exhausted form. He sat on the hard, cold stone of the demon slaughtering cave, barely seeming to register Wen Ning and Wen Qing. His eyes gazed emptily, unseeing and lifeless.

And to think, at the beginning of the simulation, Wei Wuxian’s lighthearted personality and jubilant mannerisms were part of what convinced the Jiang family this might be real. That had been a look at a future Wei Wuxian — one who had already lived through this time — one who remembered having died. No tragedy, no matter how bad, meant one should be miserable forever, but…

‘When he first came back to life, we were able to see his thoughts…’ Lan Wangji trailed off. ‘Despite that… the adult version of Wei Ying was almost identical to his fifteen year-old self. Behavior-wise, they were almost exactly the same.’

While watching that initial flashback, Lan Wangji had gotten genuinely annoyed at the simulated Wei Wuxian. The young Yiling Patriarch had seemed loud, frivolous, crude, undisciplined…

‘A-Xian, you were born with a smiling face,’ Jiang Yanli had said. ‘Always smiling, never minding sorrowful things.’

Wei Wuxian trembled silently, his cut off sobs making his shoulders shake.

‘No matter what situation you’re in, you can always be happy.’

The cave’s resentment seemed to tremble in despair.

Wei Wuxian was joy in its purest form.

How could they — how dare they — lower him to this?

Wen Qing and Wen Ning made eye contact once more. Then, as silently as the flap of a butterfly’s wings, Wen Qing knelt by Wei Wuxian’s side. There was a flash of silver.

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian toppled over.

"...Huh?" he asked.

"What?" Jiang Cheng asked simultaneously, straightening up.

Wen Qing looked down at Wei Wuxian softly, seeming regretful and yet resolute, too. Slowly, she combed her fingers through Wei Wuxian's hair, brushing it to the side.

"I'm sorry," Wen Qing muttered, pulling her hand back.

Under normal circumstances, Wei Wuxian would have been able to dodge her attack easily. However, just now, he had been caught completely off guard. Confusion covered his face, a mix of disbelief and blatant shock quickly beginning to take over.

That look was shared amongst most of the watchers. The doctor in question, however, merely closed her eyes, breathing out slowly.

(If her other self was doing this, then, in all likelihood…)

"What are you doing?" Wei Wuxian asked, watching Wen Qing and Wen Ning get up. The siblings exchanged a glance then turned back to Wei Wuxian to bow once.

It was a solemn salutation.

"Qing-guniang?" Jiang Yanli asked. "What are… what do you think-"

"What are you going to do? Just where are you going?" Wei Wuxian demanded, his voice growing frantic as he struggled to make his paralyzed body move. "Tell me!"

"When you woke up, we were in the middle of discussing this. I think we've come to a conclusion," Wen Qing said.

"Discussing what? Stop this nonsense! Take out the needle — let me go!"

'The Yiling Patriarch's been paralyzed, but he's not completely powerless,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'Unlike spiritual cultivators, most of Wei Wuxian's powers can be activated with his voice. If they plan on handing him over as a peace offering, they'll surely need to do something about that first.'

Perhaps watching this would give Jin Guangshan a better idea of how to subdue demonic cultivators, should the need arrive.

Yet, at that moment, Wen Ning stood up, his head hanging low. And then, contrary to Jin Guangshan's expectations-

"Jiejie and I have decided… we'll be going to Koi Tower."

"Koi Tower?" Madam Jin repeated.

“We’re going to… give ourselves up.”

“Huh?” Jin Zixuan asked, gazing blankly at the segment. “Wait, but-”

He looked to the side, his eyes landing on Jiang Yanli’s pale, horrified face. Eventually, he looked back at the simulation once more.

“Huh?” he asked again.

“Give yourselves up?” Wei Wuxian repeated, giving a mocking laugh at the absurdity of the suggestion. “How do you plan on doing that? Apologizing? Surrendering?”

Swallowing once, Wen Qing quickly rubbed her eyes and responded, “Yes, more or less. While you were unconscious, LanlingJin sent a few messengers to the Burial Mounds.”

“To say what? Don’t talk one word at a time! Just tell me! Finish your explanation!”

“The LanlingJin Sect wants you to answer for what you did. They’re demanding you hand over the two remaining leaders of the Wen Sect,” Wen Qing revealed. “Especially… the Ghost General.”

A sharp, cold horror fell upon most of the watchers. This wasn’t an unexpected outcome. Jin Zixuan had died — there was no way the LanlingJin sect would allow that to go unpunished.

(The specifics of who was ambushed would have no effect on that.)

Still, Nie Mingjue couldn’t help but frown.

‘Something like this… it must have attracted the attention of every sect there. I know everyone was already suspicious of Wei Wuxian because of the earlier incident, but…’

But now Jin Zixuan was dead. Everyone would assume, without hesitation, that Wei Wuxian had probably cursed Jin Zixun too. It was only natural to demand repayment.

Yet, the more he thought about it, the more Nie Mingjue furrowed his brows.

‘What if Huaisang had been in a situation like this?’

Huaisang? Weak, harmless Huaisang? It was nearly impossible to imagine. Nie Mingjue’s baby brother had barely changed even twenty years in the future.

(Said baby brother was almost a year older than Wei Wuxian.)

‘No one would think Huaisang was physically capable of using such a complex curse, but… but what if? What if someone attacked him after inviting him in as a guest? What if one of Huaisang’s bodyguards killed Jin Zixuan in the confusion? What if the Jin demanded the ‘leader of the Nie’ pay for what Huaisang had to do to defend himself? How would I respond then?’

It was hard to imagine.

It would never happen.

No one would have the gall.

(Jin Zixun was encouraged to ambush Wei Wuxian; none of the great sects would ever dare ambush the Nie. If, for some reason, this had happened to Nie Mingjue or Nie Huaisang, people would have investigated further.)

Nie Mingjue began gritting his teeth together.

'I could have called for an investigation, right? I could have questioned Zixun about his actions that day. I could have demanded to know why hundreds of people attacked two.'

Except he hadn't.

Jin Zixuan was dead. The world wanted someone to punish. Wei Wuxian had killed him. According to the Jin, Jin Zixuan's life was worth two Wen — one of whom hadn't even been there during the incident. Wen Qing had given Wei Wuxian some of the meager coins they had to buy Jin Ling a birthday present. Because of that, she would die.

'No, rather than stopping them…' Nie Mingjue paused, a sinking feeling filling his heart. 'Wouldn't I have been a cause? Wouldn't I be willing to take any chance possible to punish Wen Ruohan's kin? Forget stopping it — it was probably my suggestion!'

He wasn't even being blind anymore. It was far too intentional to call it that.

Meanwhile, for several seconds, Wei Wuxian had been silent, slowly coming to terms with what Wen Qing had said. He took in slow breaths, struggling to keep his eyes open. After several more seconds, a look of frustration crossed his face. Still paralyzed from the doctor's needle, he gradually looked up at the pair before him.

"...I'm warning you two. Get this needle out of me right now."

It was phrased as a threat. In actuality, Wei Wuxian was all-but begging her as he said this. He had to; without help, there was nothing Wei Wuxian could do. For once, the Yiling Patriarch had no plans or solutions. His first time in the Burial Mounds had been hopeless, but this, now, was…

Jiang Yanli shut her eyes, turning away. There was nothing gruesome there for her to look away from, and yet the sight before her felt like the most unbearable thing they had been shown so far.

Wen Qing, on the other hand, kept her expression tightly controlled, only allowing brief glimpses of emotion to pass through. The doctor breathed in slowly, fully composing herself once more.

"The leaders of the Wen Remnants — that's us. According to them, if you hand us over, this situation will be considered resolved. I'll have to ask you to lay here for a little while. The effects of the needle will wear off in three days. I've talked to Uncle Four already. He'll take it out if an emergency happens-"

“You can shut the fuck up!” Wei Wuxian snapped. “This is already enough of a mess as it is! Don’t add to my problems! Give yourselves up? Did I ask you to do that?! Pull the needle out!”

Jiang Cheng flinched just a little, Wei Wuxian’s shouts catching him by surprise. No matter what happened — no matter what Madam Yu said about his parents or what punishments he was given — Wei Wuxian never got angry like this. Even with Wen Chao it had been a quiet, efficient vengeance. His flute music was always haunting, never raged.

And that, more than anything, cemented exactly how powerless Wei Wuxian felt right now.

Several seconds went by, neither Wen Qing nor Wen Ning moving to take the needle out. Wei Wuxian only became angrier at that, starting to struggle like mad. However, Wen Qing’s paralysis couldn’t be overcome so easily. Wei Wuxian remained where he was, only able to look up at them and scream.

“Do you think this is funny?” he asked. “I’m not in the mood, Wen Qing! Let me go! Right now!”

She gazed back calmly.

“Take it out! If you go there, I’ll just have to save you too! It’s not going to solve anything. Do you think you’ll get something by doing this?! I’m telling you to let me go!”

Neither Wen Qing nor Wen Ning moved to help him up.

And, at last, the futility of his attempts became apparent to Wei Wuxian. The anger vanished from his gaze. His breaths hitched. When he spoke next, it was agony that could be heard most clearly:

“Why… why are you going to Koi Tower?” he asked. “I wasn’t the one who cursed Jin Zixun.”

“But they’ve already decided it was you.”

Nie Mingjue flinched back. Jiang Cheng clenched his hands into fists. Nie Huaisang merely glanced to the side, his gaze landing upon Jin Guangshan’s form.

(The man’s expression had a certain kind of satisfaction layered underneath it.)

“Then — then let’s find the person who actually set the curse!” Wei Wuxian shouted, regaining energy as he finally, finally found a solution. “Jin Zixun’s definitely gone to experts of cursing. The usual method for dealing with curses is to reflect them back on the caster! If we do that, we can then just look for someone with the same curse mark as him!”

Wen Ruohan withheld a scoff. Jin Guangshan hadn’t cared who’d actually cursed his nephew. Jin Guangyao, who’d helped Jin Zixun, probably hadn’t cared either. Now that Jin Zixuan was dead, the only one who’d actually care about the caster’s identity was Jin Zixun himself.

(A fact which Wei Wuxian surely already knew, if he was able to think rationally right now.)

And, thus, Wen Qing shook her head.

“There’s no use,” she said.

“Why not?”

“There are so many people it could be — where would you even start looking? Should we set up a checkpoint on every street of every city and make everyone who passes by take off their clothes so we can check?”

“Why not?!”

“Who’d be willing to set up checkpoints for you?!” Wen Qing snapped back. “For how long do you intend to search?! Certainly, we might find them after eight or ten years — but how long do you think those people will wait?!”

Although no one answered that question out loud, similar thoughts sprang into everyone’s minds. Wei Wuxian would have a day, maybe. Two at best; a few hours at worst.

‘Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground.’

Perhaps those assessments were overly pessimistic. Even if Wei Wuxian had intended to kill Jin Zixuan, why would that mean they’d massacre the civilians in the Burial Mounds? Something else would have to happen to cause that, right?

(Since when had they needed a reason to kill Wen dogs?)

The more they thought about it, the worse the situation seemed.

“But….” Wei Wuxian floundered, unable to accept that. “But there’s no rebounded curse mark on me!”

“During today’s incident, did they ask you?”

Wei Wuxian froze.

Jin Zixuan did the same.

“...No,” he admitted.

‘The former Sect Leader Jin spoke with Jin Zixun, suggesting to him that the banquet could be used as an opportunity to kill Wei Wuxian, meaning… meaning Sect Leader Jin wouldn’t have to welcome him to Koi Tower after all.’

“Right, they didn’t ask,” Wen Qing confirmed. “They simply prepared to kill you. Do you understand now? They don’t need any proof. They don’t care about finding the truth either. Whether you have a curse mark on your body doesn’t matter at all. You’re the Yiling Patriarch, the King of the Demonic Path. You specialize in dark curses; it wouldn't be strange at all if you didn't have a curse mark on you. Besides, you wouldn't even have to do it yourself. You could have gotten one of the Wen dogs, one of your slaves, to do it for you. You won't be able to deny it."

No matter what evidence he showed, Wei Wuxian's guilt would never be disproven.

Jin Zixun scoffed, pointing out, 'Other than a criminal using wicked means like you, who could have put such a detestable thing on me?'

If Jin Zixun's ambush had succeeded, what would people have said? Would anyone other than the Jiang Sect have done anything?

(Would the Jiang Sect even have done anything?)

Jiang Cheng swallowed, feeling nausea well up inside of him.

'If you insist on protecting them, I won't be able to protect you!'

The expression that had been on his other-self's face at that moment still lingered in Jiang Cheng's mind, clear as day.

Hadn't Wei Wuxian been kicked out of the Jiang Sect precisely so that they wouldn't have to take the fall with him? Now that Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng's brother-in-law, was dead…

"This is the fucking worst," Jiang Cheng hissed.

(Madam Yu didn't so much as twitch at Jiang Cheng's crude language. She had been thinking the same thing, after all.)

And so had Wei Wuxian, apparently. He cursed viciously, having no response to Wen Qing's argument.

"You see? There's no use," she declared. "With things as they are, the identity of the one who placed the Hundred Holes Curse is no longer important. What's important is the fact that hundreds of people were killed at Qiongqi Path and… and that Jin Zixuan was killed by A-Ning."

Jin Zixuan breathed heavily at those words, forcefully suppressing any other reaction he could have. Of course of course of course he had just made the situation a million times worse. Of course he was the reason everything started going wrong.

Or, rather…

'And it would be inconvenient for you to have to welcome someone you'd made public enemy number one, huh?' Nie Mingjue asked.

Jin Guangshan's response left much to be desired.

“I hate this situation,” Jin Zixuan muttered. Jiang Yanli, standing to his side, gave a solemn nod of agreement.

As for Wen Qing-

Neither the real nor simulated version showed much sorrow right now. They did not cry nor weep; their lips did not tremble with fear. Resignation was clear in Wen Qing's brow but determination shone through just as strongly. In the face of that, Wei Wuxian was helpless.

“But… but-”

Wei Wuxian cut off.

“But… even then, I should be the one going. I was the one who made corpses kill people. Why would the knife go instead of the murderer?!”

Wen Ning, as a fierce corpse, had been objectified time and time again. The Jin had apparently held him captive; Xue Yang had done everything he could to break him; beyond being a “Wen-dog,” the Ghost General itself was an “it” to the masses. Wei Wuxian had restored his consciousness, but…

As Wei Wuxian had just admitted, Wen Ning had no control over what had just occurred.

‘Not that Wei Wuxian had much choice in the matter either,’ the real Wen Qing thought.

Either way, blame was irrelevant. Even with Wei Wuxian’s admission of guilt, the simulated Wen Qing and Wen Ning remained unphased.

“Isn’t it better this way?” she asked.

“Better as in what?!”

Because how could anything about this situation be considered good?

“Wei Ying, we both know how the sects see us. Wen Ning is a knife — a knife that scares them, but also a knife they use as an excuse to attack you. If we go then you, without that knife, might finally be able to settle this matter. This entire thing might finally be over.”

Wei Wuxian stared at her in shock. There were no words he could say. Thus, at that moment, he let out a wordless, agonized roar.

Lan Wangji clenched his hands into fists, practically choking on his own helplessness, now.

“At this moment…” Jin Ling read out. “Wei Wuxian finally understood why Uncle would always express extreme anger toward certain things he did, why he’d always say he had a hero complex, and why he’d always say he wanted to beat him up. Watching others take the responsibility onto their own shoulders, insisting on bearing the burden of all negative consequences — it was unbearable for Wei Wuxian.”

Despite how vague such a line must have been to him, Jin Ling spoke those words solemnly and slow. Throughout the entire simulation, the juniors had always been woefully unaware of what their narration referred to. This time, however, there was a notable lack of jovialness around them.

(Last time they had seen Jin Ling, he was stabbing Wei Wuxian in the stomach. Perhaps it was inevitable that this line would impact Jin Ling more than the others would.)

(The watchers were grateful. They weren't sure they could handle hearing him be cheerful right now.)

"Do you two understand or not?" Wei Wuxian asked. "By giving yourselves up to Koi Tower — don't you know what will happen to you two, especially Wen Ning?! Don't you love your brother more than anyone else?"

"Whatever happens to him will be what he deserves."

Jiang Yanli's mouth dropped open.

"Wen Ning doesn't deserve it at all," Wei Wuxian argued. "I'm the one who-"

"Anyways, we should have been dead long ago. These remaining days we've had have been nothing but a blessing for us," Wen Qing said.

Wen Ning nodded once.

As called upon, Jin Ling elaborated with, "Wen Ning was always like this — agreeing or nodding along to what others said, never objecting. Wei Wuxian had never abhorred his nod and docility so much."

"No. You're wrong!" Wei Wuxian protested, shaking his head. However, in response, Wen Qing merely knelt down before him.

Thwack

She flicked Wei Wuxian's forehead once, the action scolding and affectionate and unnervingly calm.

It was too calm. She was going to die. Her brother was going to die. And yet all she showed right now was acceptance.

When Jiang Yanli exhaled next, her breathing was shaky and unstable. Her own saliva felt acidic on her tongue. Initially, Wen Qing's interest in the simulation had been the result of one thing and one thing alone: Wen Ning, her brother, who had been turned into a fierce corpse by Wei Wuxian. She had been willing to do anything to keep him safe from them.

The scene taking place right now should have been so far from who she was that there was no chance of it being true.

Unfortunately, as with all things in the simulation, the plausibility of this scene was exactly what made it hurt so much.

Wei Wuxian opened up his eyes again, having shut them during the flick. His eyes were watery, shining even in the cave's dim light. Wen Qing, meanwhile, allowed her smile to turn into a business-like sternness once more.

"I've said what I had to say, explained things, and said farewell. Then, goodbye."

"No-"

"No!" Jin Zixuan shouted, unable to hold himself back anymore. "No. No, it was my… you shouldn't have to-"

"Zixuan," Madam Jin said once. Her son stopped.

The tone of his mother's voice had not been angry, telling him that he should not defend his own killer. It had not been scolding either, telling him to compose himself in front of the current crowd. The 'Zixuan' she had called out just then had been tired.

Hopeless.

Resigned.

Him protesting now wouldn't change the situation. No matter how awful it was — no matter how much they hated it — there was nothing they could do.

There was nothing Wei Wuxian could do either.

Standing up, Wen Qing continued, "I've never said anything like this before. But, now that we're here, there are indeed a few things I should say. I won't have another chance after this."

"Shut up-"

"I'm sorry. And, thank you," she said.

And, with that, she and Wen Ning left. Casually, quietly, with little to no fuss at all.

Jin Zixuan sucked in a breath of air.

Jin Ling had faced Wei Wuxian again, scoffing, 'Let me tell you — don't think I'll be grateful just because you saved me! Don't expect me to say anything cringe-worthy either!'

In response, Wei Wuxian had smiled sadly.

'Young man, there are two cringe-worthy phrases that must be said no matter what,' he revealed.

'Which two?"

"Thank you,' and 'I'm sorry."

Did Jin Ling even know Wen Qing's name? If he did, did he know her as anything other than a filthy Wen dog? Did he know she was executed for Jin Zixuan's death despite not having been even remotely involved?

"She wasn't even there," he muttered.

It wasn't fair. It wasn't fair.

It still was, however. And that was the thing that was most unfair of all.

"Wei Wuxian lied there for three days."

The simulation changed. It was brighter now, the sun having moved through the sky until it was directly facing the entrance of the cave. Without the narration, it would seem like only a few hours had passed.

Wei Wuxian had been lying there helplessly for far, far longer than that.

Lan Wangji felt sick at the mere thought.

Then, without warning, there was a twitch. Wei Wuxian's fingers had moved just the slightest bit. His eyes lowered, landing on his hand. Physically speaking, that was the most response he could give right now. It didn't remain that way for long.

His fingers moved first. Then his wrists, his arms, his legs, his neck…. Wen Qing was an unmatched doctor. Her technique had been trained to perfection. Within ten minutes of that first twitch, Wei Wuxian was able to stand up once more. He was out of the cave mere moments later.

For a brief moment, Madam Yu expected the simulation to jump forward to Wei Wuxian arriving at Lotus Pier. She wasn't consciously aware of that expectation. However, as seconds passed with Wei Wuxian frantically stumbling through trees, she found herself growing more and more impatient. She wondered why it was taking so long — why it wouldn't just show his arrival at the sect.

Except, the moment Wei Wuxian got to the bottom of the Burial Mounds, he paused.

'Where… do I go now?' he wondered, breathing heavily.

The sky was growing darker, clouds moving to cover up the sun.

'The Burial Mounds?' he thought. '...No, I just came from there.'

He blinked.

'Lotus Pier?' came next. 'I haven't been there… in over a year.'

Jiang Cheng winced.

Madam Yu, standing behind him, gaped just slightly at what she had heard.

(Wei Wuxian had been kicked out of the Jiang Sect, just like she'd wanted. That was part of why, now, he had no where he could go.)

~~A strange need to smack her past-self filled Madam Yu's head. It wasn't possible — wasn't even logically consistent — but she felt the desire nonetheless.~~

Jiang Yanli clenched her hands into fists, staring resolutely at the simulation even as her eyes watered with tears.

(Right at the end of the last segment, Wei Wuxian had fallen back, buried his face in his hands, and asked for someone — anyone — to tell him what to do. No one had an answer back then. No one had an answer for him now.)

Just as Wei Wuxian had said, there was nowhere he could go.

'Koi Tower?' he thought next.

"No," Jin Zixuan begged. "Don't, don't, don't-"

The words 'Koi Tower' should have conjured a picture of home for him. Instead, all Jin Zixuan could see was a den of conspiracy and danger. If Wei Wuxian went…

~~The Ghost General had been chained up, locked away, and held captive by someone. Jin Guangshan had been one of the few people Wen Ning remembered from his capture.~~

A chill ran down Jin Zixuan's spine.

'It's already been three days,' Wei Wuxian acknowledged. 'Even if I go now, Wen Qing's corpse and Wen Ning's ashes will be the only things left.'

We Wuxian stood still, staring blankly at the sky.

(If the Jin had truly been motivated by fear and suspicion, rather than greed, Wen Ning would indeed have been just ashes by then. However, as they all knew, even thirteen years later that wouldn't be true.)

As such:

"In that moment, despite how big the world was, Senior Wei suddenly felt like it had no place for him at all."

Lan Sizhui's words stabbed straight into Jiang Cheng, leaving him gasping for air. He stumbled back, not even having realized he was standing, and fell into his chair.

'If you insist on protecting them, then I won't be able to protect you!'

'Then there's no need for you to protect me! Just go!'

The air seemed suffocating for an instant. A moment later, a sharp, cutting laugh resounded throughout the room. Jiang Cheng's throat burned, letting him know that sound was coming from him.

'At… the very least… the Wen siblings….' He paused, swallowing once. 'I need to bring back their ashes.'

Jin Zixuan's quiet, desperate repetition of 'no, no, no' got louder and louder.

There was a jump forward in time. Wei Wuxian was now at Koi Tower. He walked calmly, barely bothering to hide his presence. For some reason, sneaking in seemed even easier than ever right now. The outer halls were shockingly deserted, making coming in uninvited a trivial endeavor.

"No, no, no, no, no-"

People would pass by every once in a while, forcing Wei Wuxian to hide, but the high ranking cultivators Koi Tower often had roaming around were nowhere to be found. Wei Wuxian continued moving further inside.

He seemed to have no plan in mind. Madam Jin even noticed him making a few too many turns and walking the same hallways several times. It wasn't that he didn't know the layout of Koi Tower, but rather that he didn't have even the first clue where to look. He roamed uselessly, like a ghost floating through the halls.

The cries of an infant cut through the air.

"Who… A-Ling?" Jiang Yanli asked. "Is that… then that's-"

Wei Wuxian turned.

The cries were coming from a large, lightless place. Through the open door, the interior could be seen. A large, black coffin rested in the center of the room. Two women in white kneeled before it.

Jiang Yanli was one.

Nie Mingjue looked away.

Nie Huaisang glanced over, slightly surprised. Though Huaisang had looked away quite a few times, he couldn't recall many instances where his brother had. There was no gore nor mutilation in the sight before them now.

Despite that, it seemed like Nie Mingjue couldn't help but shake at this scene.

'Do you blame yourself, Da-ge?' Nie Huaisang wondered. 'We're hardly the most involved parties here, but… I suppose I can't blame you for feeling that way.'

If the Nie had been people Wei Wuxian felt like he could have gone to — people the Wen felt would be righteous — the tragedy unfolding before them wouldn't have happened. It was hard for anyone here to watch this unfold.

(Though, strangely, the person who looked least affected right now was Jin Guangshan, the victim's father.)

"A-Li, you can stop sitting here."

Madam Jin, the other woman clothed in white, had spoken. She reached toward Jiang Yanli, ready to help her up. Jiang Yanli just shook her head.

A defeated look — so different from the woman's usual form — came over Madam Jin.

At times like this, Madam Yu couldn't help but recall how loudly she had proclaimed that Wei Wuxian should have let her friend's son die. She wondered, now, what sort of face she would have made if Madam Jin had said the same thing about her son.

Nonetheless, Madam Jin attempted once more:

"I'll stay here," she offered. "A-Li, you shouldn't sit any longer. You won't be able to hold up."

"I'm fine, mother. I'd like… to sit here for a while longer."

The two of them had probably already been kneeling there for hours.

(Madam Jin wondered if it was just a coincidence that, at this time, Jin Guangshan was not here. Sect Leader or not, this was just a few days after the death of his son and heir.)

(If Jiang Yanli had died, Madam Jin was certain Jiang Fengmian would have been here.)

Then, at last:

"I'll get you something to eat," Madam Jin offered. She knew, clearly, that nothing she could say would convince Jiang Yanli to move away.

Gone were the determined stride and prideful posture that Madam Jin had become known for so many years ago. As soon as she turned away from Jiang Yanli, her mask fell and she began to tremble.

It wasn't that Jin Zixuan thought his mother would be indifferent to his death. Everything she had ever done, no matter how prideful she seemed at the time, told him that she loved him. Throughout the simulation, every time his other-self's death was mentioned only reinforced that fact.

And yet, despite that, seeing his strong, unwavering mother like this was still a surprise.

(A surprise that, strangely enough, brought him no comfort at all. Rather than being touched by her concern, all Jin Zixuan could do was wonder why he hadn't expected it.)

(And then, when his eyes drifted over to the real version of his father, that answer came to him like an arrow to the chest.)

Wei Wuxian, who was watching Madam Jin, frowned just a little. Though he didn't know her as well as Jin Zixuan, the change in her demeanor was clear to anyone who had met her even once. The Yiling Patriarch clenched his hands into fists.

And the slight, barely noticeable sound generated by that motion was enough to set Madam Jin alert.

"Who's there?!" she shouted, swerving toward him.

Wei Wuxian looked back at her, eyes wide.

"Everyone!" Madam Jin screamed. "Everyone! Wei Ying — he's here! He snuck into Koi Tower!"

The hate in her gaze was obvious. Understandably so. Undeniably so.

Yet, when looking at it, the real Madam Jin couldn't help but sigh.

Wei Wuxian ran. He jumped down to a lower level, hearing a torrent of footsteps bounding after him immediately after. All the while, he didn't so much as glance at Jiang Yanli.

Jiang Yanli was looking at him though. As soon as she laid eyes on Wei Wuxian, her mouth opened for some sort of call — for some sort of shout, some sort of scream.

Wei Wuxian moved too fast. They cut away before they could hear her say anything.

Jiang Yanli moved closer to Jin Zixuan, her long-standing, ongoing frustration leaking through in the form of a deep, weary exhaustion. Right at the very beginning, they had been told Wei Wuxian would kill Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli. For most of this time, Jiang Yanli had been certain that was just abjectly untrue. However, that hadn't explained the strange guilt Wei Wuxian felt every time Jin Ling or Jiang Cheng mentioned them.

She understood now, why it had happened. There were countless factors you could point to, but, above all else, Jin Zixuan had scared Wei Wuxian in that instant.

'So what about me?' Jiang Yanli wondered. 'They accused you of killing me too, right? I know you would never want to, but…. You haven't seen me much in the last few years. You heard about my wedding from Lan Wangji.'

It was a point she went back to again and again. Almost more so than anything else the simulation had shown, that was one thing she could not accept.

'A-Xian… right now… were you scared of me?'

It felt hard to deny, seeing Wei Wuxian fleeing Koi Tower and then Lanling as a whole. Even without his sword, he was not easy to catch. The few cultivators in Lanling lost sight of him soon enough. However, even then, Wei Wuxian didn't stop trying to run. The trees and forests he passed through all blurred together, making it near-impossible to tell where he was. Even Wei Wuxian probably didn't know. Nonetheless, at one point, he finally began to slow.

If it weren't for the fact that the simulation now showed a setting sun creeping down behind the trees, Wen Ruohan would have had no idea how long Wei Wuxian ran. The Chief Cultivator stared with narrowed eyes, watching Wei Wuxian's shaking form.

The Yiling Patriarch breathed heavily, his eyes gazing blankly at the space before him.

~~Even without a core~~ Wei Wuxian could run quite fast. However, the same issue he had before arose once more. Right now, there was nowhere Wei Wuxian could go. No one would help him now.

Wen Ruohan closed his eyes, breathing out slowly.

'I don't want to watch this,' he thought.

A childish, ridiculous, illogical notion.

Wei Wuxian shook, breathing heavily a few times more.

There was murmuring to the side.

At last, Wei Wuxian glanced over. Whether he was consciously aware of it or not, the large, bustling crowd outside of the city had probably been part of the reason he stopped. The people there were holding a heated, passionate discussion.

"Ghost General-!"

"The Yiling Patriarch-!"

"Those Wen dogs!"

Perhaps hearing those familiar words had been enough to make Wei Wuxian come to a halt. At the very least, they were enough to make him direct his attention toward the speakers now.

"The Ghost General is truly fierce. He said he was there to give himself up but then suddenly went on a rampage. He went around slaughtering again, this time in Koi Tower!"

"I'm glad I didn't attend that day."

"He's a dog trained by Wei Wuxian! No wonder he bites everyone in his path!"

"Wei Ying, though… he shouldn't have made it if he couldn't control it. Creating a mad dog without a leash — sooner or later, he's gonna go through a qi deviation. With the way things are going, I doubt that day is far away. His creations will turn on him, of that I'm sure!"

Wen Ning was an 'it' to everyone here. They didn't use that word to refer to whether Wen Ning was conscious or not during that attack. Either way, he would still be an 'it' to them.

Wen Qing sat frighteningly still. Her hands were not clenched into fists, though they had been just moments before. Her stare was as blank as Wei Wuxian's.

'Suddenly, he went on a rampage,' they'd said.

Wen Ning had gone berserk?

Right. Now that she thought about that, she knew that already.

In the far future, Wei Wuxian united with Wen Ning once more. The fierce corpse had been missing for many years, presumed dead. Nails had been stuck into his head.

'The Sects agreed to force me to hand you and the Stygian Tiger Seal over to them. I tried to destroy the amulet before I died, but you… it was said you'd been turned to ashes by the LanlingJin sect.'

When that was shown, Wen Qing hadn't known how to respond.

She hadn't known that she and her brother had given themselves up willingly, all to protect Wei Wuxian. They had been willing to die for him.

(Wen Ning had not died.)

(What had they done to her brother, those thirteen years?)

Wei Wuxian had then raised two fingers, bringing them to the center of Wen Ning's head. A moment later, the world changed. Lan, Nie, Jiang, and Jin cultivators had glared at them — at Wen Ning, whose memories they were seeing — with a cautious, wary hate. Wen Ning had then growled, his muscles tensing up.

'The Ghost General is going crazy!' someone had screamed.

Nie Mingjue had raised his saber and leapt forward.

The next thing Wen Ning remembered was being chained up in a cave, the three figures present discussing the progress they had made on him.

And now, as Wen Qing looked on at the crowd of frenzied gossipers surrounding the city gates, she couldn't help but laugh.

And yet, at the next words spoken, her mad laughter broke off into a pained half-gasp.

"How unfortunate for the LanlingJin Sect," someone said.

Jin Zixuan had died. That was, objectively, unfortunate. When Wen Ning rampaged, more from LanlingJin had probably died.

“Things are even worse for the GusuLan Sect! Over half of the thirty-or-so victims were from that sect! They were clearly only there to help calm things down!”

Because the Lan Sect was righteous and had a duty to intervene when things went wrong. It was something Lan Xichen had taken pride in his entire life.

Wei Wuxian shook his head: ‘Why would the knife go instead of the murderer?!’

People had died when Wen Ning rampaged. Members of the Lan Sect had died.

~~Because Lan Xichen had decided to trust those who blatantly coveted that knife time and time again.~~

“It’s a good thing the Ghost General was finally burned to ash. If not, just the idea of that thing roaming outside, going on rampages now and again, would be enough to give me nightmares!”

Someone spat on the ground, agreeing, “That’s the end all Wen Dogs should meet!”

(The end Wen Ning had not met, despite these claims.)

(A fact Wei Wuxian did not know, given the expression spreading across his face.)

“The Ghost General’s been erased. Wei Wuxian should realize what’s going on by now, huh? I heard many sect leaders have already left to go to the pledge conference! How terrific!”

A chill ran up Jiang Cheng’s spine. It was a feeling he had grown used to over the past few days.

‘Other me, you… you better put a stop to whatever’s going on. Or, or at the very least-’

Jiang Cheng’s hands clenched into fists, desperation filling him.

‘-Don’t make it worse.’

Right now, as Wei Wuxian listened to the gathered crowd’s words, his face turned colder than ice. Even Lan Wangji’s usual demeanor didn’t match the frigid chill now featured on the Patriarch.

‘Of course…’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘No matter what I do, no one’s ever pleased. When I win, they fear me. When I lose, they cheer.’

(Wei Wuxian had ‘cheated’ to get one third of the prey. Nie Mingjue had simply done as expected.)

‘I’m a cultivator of the crooked path either way. What did those years of persistence mean? What were they for?’

Within that chill, a slow-burning rage began to churn.

The resentful energy passed that feeling along quite clearly. It was unnecessary; Nie Mingjue was feeling like that regardless.

Wen Ruohan’s fingers twitched, the desire to tear out the speakers’ throats growing strong. As it was, he settled for committing their features to memory. If he wanted to find them again, he was certain he could.

Those faces were now smiling wide, laughter spreading across the group. Jeers and condemnations sprang forth, every insult and accusation they could manage thrust onto Wei Wuxian one by one.

“Ha! It’ll be perfect if he spends the rest of his life obediently huddling in that damn mountain of his. If he dares show his face outside from now on? Well, as soon as he’s out I’ll go and…”

“And do what?”

For a moment, there was a pause.

A deep, vengeful grin settled on the faces of more than one watcher there.

Those grins then faltered when their attention settled on Wei Wuxian once more. Now fully in the light, the paleness of his skin and the bags under his eyes became even more prominent than before. The setting sun painted the sky red, but Wei Wuxian’s eyes seemed to glow an even deeper crimson.

Wei Wuxian repeated his question:

“If ‘he’ dares to come out, you’ll do what?” he asked.

The world seemed to be operating in slow motion. Even the animals began to still.

Someone’s gaze dropped to the flute by Wei Wuxian’s side.

“Chenqing — it’s Chenqing!”

That shout was enough. People fled, scattering in all directions. Screams flew into the wind. Their terror was nearly tangible in the pandemonium. Then, raising his fingers to his lips, Wei Wuxian whistled once.

BAM

The three dozen people who had been crashing into each other as they fled slammed against the ground. Several people gasped, the wind knocked out of them, and trembled a little in place.

A deep, deep satisfaction filled both the watchers and the obeying resentful spirits.

“How dare they?!” Madam Yu asked. “Ha. If you’re going to speak such words, you should be prepared for something like this to happen.”

“Huh? What’s wrong?” Wei Wuxian asked, walking forward unhurriedly. “Weren’t you all quite confident when discussing me behind my back? Now that I’ve appeared before you, you can’t do anything but lie on the ground?”

Of course they couldn’t. Of course they can’t. The spirits who had been tasked with holding them down would not let go until ordered to.

Wen Ruohan smirked, gazing down at the fallen fools. Lan Qiren and Nie Mingjue didn’t share his expression, but the emotions the three men were feeling were one and the same.

(At the beginning of the simulation, if they had been shown this scene in isolation, it would have seemed to match the reputation of ‘the Yiling Patriarch’ perfectly. It would have been dishonorable, cruel, and a sign of the corruption demonic cultivation had inflicted upon Wei Wuxian. Technically speaking, these men had never attacked anyone themselves. Technically, they were innocents.

‘That’s the end all Wen dogs should meet!’

That phrase, which Nie Mingjue had spoken a version of no less than a thousand times, now sounded so wrong to him it was hard to fathom.

The one who had said that very same line now stared up with wide eyes, his cocksure and arrogance replaced by an overwhelming fear. Wei Wuxian walked close, sending a smile down.

“Go on. Talk,” he instructed.

The man opened his mouth to speak but no sound came out. At most, it could be said that a whimper escaped him.

Wei Wuxian stomped down on his face, grinding his boot into the other’s mouth.

“Why aren’t you talking anymore? Go on, Mister Hero. What were you going to do to me?” he asked.

Jiang Yanli felt her eyes water with tears.

‘You know, before we came to Yi City, a lot of people also claimed that the Yueyang Chang Clan’s Chang Ping was killed by Xiao Xingchen Daozhang’s hands. But was that the truth?’ Lan Sizhui asked.

Jin Ling scoffed: ‘All they had were guesses so why are you calling them claims? But just try to count how many cultivators lost their lives to Wei Ying, to Wen Ning — to the Stygian Tiger Seal! These are truths that everyone accepts, that no one can deny!’

‘The Yiling Patriarch is evil.’ That was a truth that ‘everyone accepted’ and that ‘no one could deny.’ As such, even Wei Wuxian couldn’t help but refer to those against him as ‘heroes.’ That wasn’t a phrase he would have used for Wen Chao, even if Wen Chao had said the exact same thing as this person. The Wen were ‘Wen-dogs,’ but the Yiling Patriarch was a demon. Everyone hated him. No one would stand with him.

Wei Wuxian stomped down once more. Blood fell to the ground. Screams filled the air.

Wei Wuxian had broken the man’s nose.

(Wen Qing had been executed. Wen Ning was locked up, experimented on until he became a mindless puppet once more.)

The simulation changed their position. Now, they stood on the city gate’s walls, staring down at the mayhem alongside a horrified crowd. Several reached out, moving for talismans or for their swords or toward the conflict below, but none could bring themselves to act.

‘Good,’ Wen Ruohan thought. ‘You should fear him.’

Jiang Yanli’s tears continued without pause.

‘I wish they could just understand him,’ she thought.

However, at long last, one member of the audience finally worked up the nerve to speak, shouting down, “W-Wei Ying! If you’re so strong, why don’t you go find the sect leaders at the Pledge Conference?! What can you prove by bullying us low level cultivators too powerless to fight back?!”

Normally, Wen Ruohan would have scoffed at such a suggestion. Those who would happily rally against Wei Wuxian if they were stronger now wished to get out of this mess by throwing away their pride. Just a few minutes ago, when they had been celebrating the ‘deaths’ of Wen Ning and Wen Qing, those same people didn’t care that Wen Qing had never once fought against them. Normally, Wen Ruohan would do everything he could to make this reality clear to them.

Right now, however, something else was more worthy of his attention.

“Pledge Conference?” he repeated.

All the sect leaders were taking part?

Nie Mingjue, Jiang Cheng, Jiang Yanli, Jin Zixuan, and the Lans all went pale.

Meanwhile, Wei Wuxian was still focused on the situation at hand. With a single one of his whistles, the speaker was shoved forward, tumbling off the city wall and breaking his legs upon impact with the ground. The man’s screams and wails cut through the air.

Wei Wuxian scoffed, repeating, “‘Low level cultivators?’ What, do I have to tolerate you, just because you’re low level cultivators? If you dare to say such things you should have the ability to shoulder the consequences! If you know you're insignificant pieces of scum as filthy as ants, why don't you think before you speak?!"

The man could only whimper once more, too terrified to say anything.

As the silence continued, no one else daring to raise their voice, Wei Wuxian nodded in satisfaction, commenting, "Yes, that's the spirit."

He kicked again, this time knocking out a handful of teeth.

Cruel actions. Arrogant, mocking, dismissive words. It almost reminded Wen Qing of how Wen Ruohan usually spoke. Yet, underneath all that, there was a shakiness Wei Wuxian couldn't quite hold back.

Many of the waters let out a slow breath. What Wei Wuxian was feeling right now wasn't just resentment, but hate.

Then again, even without any resentment, most of the watchers would probably be feeling the same thing.

(What would Nie Mingjue have done if he saw people celebrating the execution of Huaisang? What would Lan Xichen do if Lan Wangji had never hurt anyone, never done anything but heal and protect, and was asked to die for the sake of an incident he hadn't been involved in? Would he excuse the words of these men based on the lack of information they had? Would he criticize violence against them based on their relative lack of power? Would he try to play mediator once more and simply watch as his family was mocked?)

('He's a dog trained by Wei Wuxian! No wonder he bites everyone in his path!')

(If Lan Xichen did manage to hold himself back in such a situation, would the real version of him, right now, be able to forgive himself for that?)

Splatters of blood could be seen on the dirt-covered stones. The victim of Wei Wuxian's attack was unconscious, now. Wei Wuxian turned toward the crowd, leaving a bloody footprint in his wake.

"You scum were right about one thing," he acknowledged. "There's not much meaning in wasting time with you people. You want me to find the major clans? Fine; time to clear up a few things with them."

With that, he turned on his heel and began to march away.

Not too long ago, the watchers had laughed at the public's foolishness. Civilians spread rumors and slanderous lies about the Yiling Patriarch — lies which, when compared against the man who cursed radishes to play tag with him and A-Yuan, seemed foolish beyond compare. Everything that had been said about the Yiling Patriarch was ludicrous when you were faced with 'Xian-gege' instead.

Right now, however…

The resentment in the air sent their nerves aflame. It felt like sparks were zapping through their blood, making their hearts pound with a mad fever. In direct contrast to that, a thick, heavy cloud seemed to be weighing down on them. The hate Wei Wuxian felt right now was churning within them as well.

Jin Guangshan sucked in a deep breath, in awe of what he felt now. Wei Wuxian had shown this side of himself against Wen Chao, but it had been a long time since they last got to experience it. If Jin Guangshan were to have dominion over this beast, even Wen Ruohan would be no match for him anymore.

(Something in the Chief Cultivator had changed in the last few segments. If things continued at this rate, Jin Guangshan couldn't be sure their alliance would still hold value once the watchers all got out.)

Right before Wei Wuxian departed completely, he snuck a glance over his shoulder. His eyes fell upon a sign above the city gates. 'Pledge Conference' was written front and center on the announcement board. It stated as follows:

[The LanlingJin Sect, the QinghеNie sect, the GusuLan Sect, and the YunmengJiang Sect will now scatter the ashes of the Wen Sect's remnants above the Clan's old stronghold, the Nightless City. At the same time, we will now pledge our eternal opposition to the Yiling Patriarch, who has occupied the Burial Mounds and declared himself an enemy of the world.]

In this very same segment, Wen Qing and Wen Ning had sacrificed themselves to save their families, including Wei Wuxian:

'The leaders of the Wen Remnants — that's us. According to them, if you hand us over, this situation will be considered resolved.'

Resolved. It was resolved. She had given her life. Her brother had given his freedom. They were 'dead,' so the situation was resolved.

(The Jin had invited Wei Wuxian to an ambush in the form of Jin Ling's hundred-day ceremony. Wen Qing was supposed to be smart, wasn't she? How could she have fallen for this?)

"Eternal opposition?" Jiang Yanli repeated. "But… but-"

At that moment, Wen Qing felt something hot run down her cheek. The world became blurry, every beam of light distorting as water fell from her eyes.

(At that moment, Wen Qing had no other options. The sects had given her an ultimatum. If she hadn't gone, their eventual attack would have been her fault.)

(But of course they were still going to attack. Of course they would. Of course.)

"We… we can't do that."

"Da-ge?" Nie Huaisang asked, looking over.

“What?” Nie Mingjue gasped out, huffing something that wasn’t quite a laugh. “We can’t do that. Did… did Wen Qing misunderstand the terms of surrender? No, everyone must have known — why would the Wen have given themselves up if not for peace? But then why would we-”

Nie Mingjue cut off, feeling the answer cut straight through him.

(It was because they were Wen dogs, of course.)

(When Jin Guangyao had tricked people and taken their lives, it was dishonorable. It was evil and proved him to be a treacherous snake wearing human skin.)

(‘Meng Yao… let me ask you something. The first time I saw you, did you purposefully put on a pitiful act so that I’d come to your rescue? If I hadn’t stepped in, would you have done what you did today and killed those people?!’)

(Nie Mingjue himself had spoken those words.)

(This, however, was fine. They had invited Wei Wuxian and ambushed him on the way. They had told the Wen to exchange themselves for peace and gone back on their promise a matter of days later. That was all alright though. They weren’t making deals with humans, but with dogs — why would it matter whether they used honesty when dealing with them?)

Nie Mingjue brought a hand to his mouth, feeling nausea rise up in his throat.

(He had done this. He had supported this. He had allowed this — encouraged this!)

He couldn’t look at Wen Qing right now. He couldn’t look at Nie Huaisang or Lan Xichen. Despite everything, right now, Nie Mingjue couldn’t even bring himself to look at Wen Ruohan.

Some ways in front of him, Jiang Yanli fell to her knees.

“It’s not fair,” he heard the young woman say, sobs beginning to bubble up from her chest. “That’s not fair!”

Madam Yu, Jiang Cheng, and Jin Zixuan all looked away, not a single one able to even try to offer her some comfort.

Though Wei Wuxian had long-since vanished from the scene before them, the watchers’ view had not moved to follow him yet. They remained with the villagers, many of whom were still being crushed against the ground by the spirits Wei Wuxian had left behind. They were pale and wide eyed, still waiting for one of them to die any second from now.

(But, despite everything they said, Wei Wuxian hadn’t killed a single one. Injured them, traumatized them, and smashed their pride into smithereens, but not killed.)

‘Of course not. Why would he?’ Lan Qiren thought, watching with clouded eyes. ‘Even now, Wei Wuxian would never do something like that. They all were simply speaking, not acting.

The ones his vengeance should be pointed towards are the ones who went back on the offer they themselves made.'

And, considering where Wei Wuxian was now headed to, that was a confrontation that would happen very soon.

And yet, even as more time passed, they stayed here. There was a slight jump. The time of day seemed to be the same and no one had gone far, but the people not pinned down had moved a little. A few minutes, maybe an hour, had gone by.

Then, suddenly, a flash of soft blue light passed by. As soon as the sword's glare went above the cultivators, those people found they could move once more. They inhaled heavily, the sudden disappearance of the weights on their backs leaving many breathless for a moment.

"I can move!" someone shouted, their elation clear.

A moment later, the sword glare returned to the owner's sheath.

"Wangji?" Lan Xichen gasped.

Hanguang-jun looked down at the cultivators before him.

Nie Huaisang's eyes widened slightly and he walked closer, observing Hanguang-jun intently. After a few seconds, he glanced over at the real Lan Wangji before turning his attention to the simulated one once more.

A handsome face and white robes that didn't have even a speck of dirt on them. Despite the hurry Lan Wangji had just been in, he was still pristine. Hanguang-jun looked more and more like his far future self every time they saw him. However, there was still a fair bit more emotion present in his body language than his far future self had. Rapidly moving eyes that analyzed everything they looked over; a slight twitch of his hand that conveyed the anticipation within; short, quickened breaths unaccompanied by any sweat or signs of physical exhaustion. This Hanguang-jun was worried.

Nie Huaisang tilted his head just slightly.

'What have you been thinking over the past few days, Wangji-xiong?' he wondered. 'Wei-xiong's had the whole world turn against him. Zixuan-xiong is dead, Wen-guniang and Wen-gongzi were executed, and now our brothers are heading off to attack him. Do you wish you'd said more, back when there was still time for things to change? Do you wish you did what your future self will later do? Even now, you could tie Wei-xiong up and drag him back to the Cloud Recesses.'

(But, after forcing a kiss on Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji had pulled back time and time again.)

'And what about my future self?' Nie Huaisang wondered. 'Have I… thought of anything like that?'

(Both their brothers were at the conference. Both of them could have done something.)

(Neither did.)

“H-hanguang-jun!” someone called out. It was the man whose legs Wei Wuxian had broken not too long before. Lan Wangji walked over to him, kneeling down so that he could examine the man’s legs. He pressed lightly, sending some energy in and gaining information in a way the watchers couldn’t right now.

‘...It was a clean break,’ Lan Wangji observed. ‘He will be back to normal in a few weeks so long as he lets it rest.’

On a cultivator, something like this would heal just fine. Wei Wuxian’s techniques were hard to describe or understand, but that didn’t mean he didn’t know what he was doing. All in all, the only thing he’d done with permanent consequences was knocking out the man’s teeth. A harsh punishment for sure, but not the extent of what ‘the Yiling Patriarch’ should be willing to do.

‘Have I gotten too biased?’ Lan Qiren wondered. ‘At the beginning of the simulation, anyone attacking non combatants like this would have appalled me. These men aren’t responsible for what’s happening to him.’

They weren’t responsible. They weren’t solely responsible, but-

‘That’s the end all Wen dogs should meet!’

Wen Qing had given herself up so that her family wouldn’t be hurt.

The LanlingJin Sect, the QinghеNie sect, the GusuLan Sect, and the YunmengJiang Sect will now scatter the ashes of the Wen Sect’s remnants above the Clan’s old stronghold, the Nightless City. At the same time, we will now pledge our eternal opposition to the Yiling Patriarch, who has occupied the Burial Mounds and declared himself an enemy of the world.

When Wei Wuxian had been told to give up his hand to the Wen, he had gritted his teeth and accepted it in order to protect Yunmeng Jiang. He could handle sacrifice; he could give for the sake of peace.

He had just given two of his closest friends up for that very same reason.

And what now? Wen Qing and Wen Ning had just been ~~murdered~~ executed. Was he supposed to just sit back and accept them being called dogs? Lower his head and continue to play nice? Why? Everyone here would only turn on him time and time again.

In his youth, Wei Wuxian had ignored the rules laid out and followed his own judgment instead. Madam Yu would punish him no matter what he did; laws meant nothing, under that. Wei Wuxian was decreed responsible for cursing Jin Zixun just because of who he was. Why shouldn’t he curse people when in a situation like that?

(And yet he hadn’t killed them. He’d held himself back.)

(Who knew how much longer he’d be able to.)

“What have we done?” Lan Qiren whispered, horror settling in.

Meanwhile, the rescued men and women swarmed Lan Wangji in droves, some thanking him profusely, others informing him of the matter at hand:

Lan Xichen winced a little, watching his brother’s expression gain a terrible kind of desperation.

“Will Hanguang-jun track him down?” someone in the crowd asked quietly.

Another turned to them at once, whispering, “You haven’t heard? They say Hanguang-jun of Gusulan has been searching everywhere for Wei Wuxian over the past few days. He probably wants to settle things — make Wei Wuxian pay for the dozens of lives Gusulan lost!”

At the same time, a third member of the crowd shouted out, “Wei Wuxian’s been gone for less than an hour. If you leave now, you’ll surely be able to find him!”

When Wei Wuxian had first been brought back to life, he had fled Lan Wangji, thinking the other wanted to bring him before the world so justice could be sought. It had surely made sense to Wei Wuxian; several members of the Gusulan sect had lost their lives to him.

Except that he had been paralyzed for the past few days.

Except that the initial battle had been an ambush against him.

Except that the Ghost General, who had “mysteriously” gone on a rampage, was not executed but instead imprisoned so he could be studied as a weapon of war.

The people within the simulation stood tense and ready for action.

“What did he do here?” Lan Wangji asked, his tone firm. “Where is he going?”

The other cultivators rushed to complain:

“He fought with us without any care for honor and nearly killed everyone here!”

“You call that a fight?” Wen Ruohan repeated, skeptically.

Lan Wangji’s fingers twitched slightly, the movement too subtle for the average cultivator to notice, then forcefully relaxed shortly after.

“Oh, and he said he was going to Nightless City! He’s going to settle things with the Four Great Sects!”

Hearing ‘Four’ Great Sects instead of ‘Five’ didn’t bother the watchers anymore. Even the mention of Nightless City — now alight with the torches of those who had wiped them out, rather than the Wen themselves — didn’t trigger much of a reaction out of them. Instead, right now, their focus was centered solely on the impending disaster unfolding before their eyes.

'Don't go to Nightless City, Wei Wuxian,' Wen Qing mentally begged. 'There's no point in trying to confront them. Just run.'

Run where? With that many people? For how long? The Sects had already shown they weren't content to just leave them be.

'A-Xian, be careful!' Jiang Yanli prayed.

Now, at last, the simulation changed scenes. There was darkness at first. Then, light.

The moon was high in the sky. It was full and bright, allowing any passing traveler to find their way. There was light coming from below as well. The Nightless City of Qishan was filled with torches and lamps, carried by cultivators from every sect and clan one could imagine.

(Every clan except, of course, the Wen.)

Wen Ruohan's face remained neutral, a stern, forceful blankness being the only thing anyone would be able to see. However, with every tap of his finger on the armrest of his chair, a bit of qi would snap out like a silent growl of rage.

Jin Guangshan swallowed nervously.

Nightless City had become a symbol for the allied sects. They had beaten the evil Wen once; they could do it again. Right now, it was the flags of their sects that decorated these halls, the hanging banners covering up the suns carved there.

The sight was a strange reflection of what might have one day come.

Wang Lingjiao clapped her hands together in an almost-mocking applause. The woman's gaze was smug and satisfied, not at all fearing for herself. As they would soon learn, the Wen army right outside Yunmeng Jiang's gates was the reason for that.

'Yu-furen, I admire you so much!' she sang out. 'We'll definitely get along after they set up the Supervisory Office.'

It had been a taunt, most likely. While Wen Ruohan would be perfectly happy to make Yunmeng Jiang an office of the Wen, there was no way that proclamation could go down without resulting in a fight. It wasn't the point of it all, just an excuse.

Yu Ziyuan had taken the bait.

The end result was inevitable. Sect Leader Jiang and Yu Ziyuan were killed. The sect was overrun. The heir was caught and rendered powerless.

(Would have stayed powerless, if not for his head disciple.)

If Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen had been a bit slower to unite the sects — if fewer of the heirs had survived to lead their sects to arms — if Wei Wuxian had not come back from a death trap, bringing with him a weapon no sect had ever come even close to before, Wen Ruohan probably would have redecorated the Jiang, Lan, and Nie Sects with flags of the burning sun.

It was only fair of them to repay that in kind. Wen Ruohan exhaled heavily, shutting his eyes.

'Look. This is the result of the choices you made.'

Would anything have actually changed, if Wen Ruohan had won? He would have more control over the other sects. He would get to stop them from making so many thoughtless, illogical choices when it came to the treatment of their disciples.

'Would that really be worth losing A-Ying to the Burial Mounds?'

Wen Ruohan had decided to risk it all.

(He'd lost it all as a result.)

And now-

The simulation brought them closer, showing the prominent sect leaders at the center of the crowd. Jin Guangshan, Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, and Jiang Cheng gathered around a lacquered table, raising their glasses in a toast. To the side, Jin Guangyao directed servants to ideal positions. Torches brightened, making the sect leaders even more prominent than before.

"Tonight, the LanlingJin Clan-"

"-the QinghеNie Clan-"

"-the GusuLan Clan-"

"-the YunmengJiang Clan-"

"-and all other clans here stand united," Jin Guangshan declared. "No matter the sect — no matter the surname — this cup of wine is in honor of the soldiers who have died."

"May their souls live on," Nie Mingjue agreed.

"May they rest in peace," Lan Xichen added on.

Jiang Cheng didn't say anything, merely maintaining a darkened expression as he filled his cup with wine.

"To our heroes!!!" the crowd shouted as one.

Jin Zixuan had not deserved to die. His death could be treated as a tragedy. However-

‘Hero?’ Zixuan mentally repeated. ‘What, the guy who lunged at the victim after inviting him into a trap?’

And what about everyone else? They all had gone into this knowing they were ambushing his guest. No one even had a reason beyond ‘Wei Wuxian is the only one evil enough to do this.’

Unable to hold it back, he scoffed under his breath.

(Both Nie Huaisang and Lan Wangji glanced over at him, paused, then looked away, not having anything helpful to say.)

At that moment, Jin Guangyao returned. In his arms was an ornate black box, decorated with silver. Jin Guangshan took it without hesitation. It wasn’t a slow, ceremonial hand-over, nor was it a delicate hold. Not the sort of behavior that was typical if the box contained treasures or artifacts or gifts, especially from Jin Guangshan.

Nie Huaisang bounced over, trying to take a closer look.

And then, holding the box with only one hand, Jin Guangshan raised it into the air.

“Here lie the ashes of the Wen Sect’s remnants!”

Jiang Yanli went pale and Jin Zixuan flinched back, reaching down to clutch at his chest where his future-self had been attacked. Because yes, he had been attacked.

But-

…

All of the watchers, without exception, found themselves looking back at Wen Qing.

“Several days ago, about a hundred cultivators and… my son, Jin Zixuan… were murdered at Qiongqi path.”

“Scatter their ashes!”

“Scatter their ashes!”

“Scatter their ashes!”

The crowd was riled up, filled with hate.

Horror spread across many of the watchers’ faces. Madam Yu was among them, furrowing her brows at the shouts. However, a moment later, she righted herself, quickly calming down. Part of Yu Ziyuan was tempted to scoff at her own reaction.

(Yes, those people were celebrating the deaths of the Wen. However, wasn’t this a far more honorable send-off than what she and her husband got? Jin Zixuan was actually dead — the Jiang had never done anything permanent to the Wen. Wang Lingjiao had tried to slap her when she was already a corpse, her and her husband's cores having been crushed.)

(So why did this feel so much worse than that?)

Golden light enveloped the box like a flame, Jin Guangshan's spiritual energy surging in. For a moment, as the golden power danced around the box, the simulation overlaid another image on top.

"Qing-guniang?"

It was her, just as Jiang Yanli had said. She was bound tightly to a post, her hair being the only part of her still able to move. Wind blew it to the side, making it flow in the same direction as the growing field of fire by her feet.

It was an execution.

Wen Qing's* execution.

Nie Mingjue clenched his teeth together, having to force himself to watch. Lan Xichen felt his hands begin to tremble.

The two of them couldn't see their other-selves in this image, but knew they almost certainly were there. At the very least, they would have been able to prevent it, if they so pleased.

'Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning had been at Qiongqi path.' No one had ever suggested Wen Qing was there.

'I've heard Wen Qing's name a few times before,' Lan Xichen had said once. 'I do not remember her having participated in the Sunshot Campaign's crimes.'

Nie Mingjue had been uncompromising: 'If she responded with only silence rather than opposition, that's the same as indifference. She couldn't have been so naive as to hope she could be treated with respect while the Wen Sect committed evil without suffering the consequences once the Wen Sect was wiped out.'

Jiang Cheng had remained silent, refusing to speak up.

The Sect Leaders there had all agreed: Wen Qing had never hurt anyone and had never done anything wrong. She was being punished for not stopping her family.

(Lan Xichen probably just hadn't wanted to argue against it. Not when Jin Zixuan had just been killed.)

(Nie Mingjue's grudge was likely still going strong. That was enough for him to encourage this.)

Both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue were letting her burn alive for that.

(It was truly pointless.)

Wen Qing knew that, surely. The simulation moved closer to her, the heat of the fire unfelt by the watchers yet burning nonetheless. The doctor's skin was shriveling, the fire scalding her ankles and eating away at her flesh, muscles, and nails. She would die soon.

And yet, in that moment, she did not scream. On the contrary, Wen Qing simply shut her eyes, a look of acceptance coming over her.

As Jiang Yanli watched, she felt her eyes starting to water again. The immense light from the fire was unrelated to her reaction; her thoughts were the true cause. As more and more flesh melted away, Jiang Yanli felt nausea rise up within her.

How could Wen Qing's executioners just stand by and watch this?

(Was there anything Wen Qing could have done to avoid this fate?)

(There most certainly was: if she had never saved Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng, the allied sects would probably have lost the war. She might still be alive, then.)

The vision of Wen Qing's execution disappeared. The flames became Jin Guangshan's energy once more and the box, containing her ashes, became overwhelmed soon enough. In a dramatic spectacle, the box shattered into a thousand pieces!

Wen Qing's ashes were swept away by the wind.

(The crowd roared in triumph.)

Wang Lingjiao and Wen Chao would have done the same thing watching Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian's ashes get scattered. The Wen Sect as a whole would have loved that.

They hadn't managed to do that.

(Wen Ning had betrayed his sect and retrieved their ashes for Jiang Cheng. Wen Qing had risked her life to help him.)

And now, in the audience of this spectacle, Jiang Cheng did nothing to stop it. Wen Qing's ashes were blown into the distance.

Jiang Cheng looked down.

Neither Nie Mingjue nor Lan Xichen's expressions wavered at the sight.

The real Nie Mingjue cursed. Lan Xichen felt Lan Wangji's gaze drifting his way, but couldn't look up to meet it.

As far as everyone in that audience knew, both Wen Ning and Wen Qing's ashes had just been scattered. A deafening cheer spread throughout the hall.

Jin Zixuan felt sick. He could taste bile in his mouth. The ashes scattered terrifyingly quickly. He could not look at Wen Qing right now. Neither, it seemed, could Jiang Cheng or Jiang

Yanli. They all-

“Da-ge?” Nie Huaisang suddenly asked.

“...Yes, Huaisang?” Nie Mingjue asked back.

“Even for a scattering of the ashes, there’s… a lot of people here,” the Nie heir observed. “They described it as a ‘Pledge Conference,’ right? They said we would ‘Pledge our eternal opposition to the Yiling Patriarch,’ didn’t they?”

And with the usage of ‘we’ instead of ‘they,’ it was hard for anyone to immediately disregard that. Wen Ruohan’s gaze fell upon Nie Huaisang once more, waiting to see what was to come.

“Da-ge,” Nie Huaisang began again. “Everyone seems quite well-armed, don’t they.”

Not a question.

There was no need for it to be a question. The implication was obvious.

(But this wasn’t a hypothetical. These weren’t strangers. This was them. Yes, Jin Guangshan was in the lead, but they had no obligation to follow along. This was the pure Lan Xichen, the righteous Nie Mingjue, and Wei Wuxian’s own ~~former~~ shidi Jiang Cheng.)

(They had brought the best combatants in their sects here.)

Before he had even consciously registered the implications, Jiang Cheng whispered a quiet, desperate, “Please no.”

Jin Guangshan raised his hand, silencing the crazed crowd.

“Tonight, we scattered the ashes of the two leaders of the Wen Sect’s remnants.”

Every chair in the room trembled, Wen Ruohan’s annoyance taking physical form.

Jin Zixuan looked away, unable to watch what his father would say next.

“Tomorrow it will be the rest of the Wen dogs and the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Ying!”

If the cheer before had been deafening, this one that occurred at those words was indescribable.

(Wen Qing’s ashes could no longer be seen.)

Nie Mingjue looked down, again feeling as though he was going to throw up. Lan Xichen was pale enough to be truly mistaken for a statue made of jade. Madam Yu and Wen Ruohan looked ready to kill the next person that made a sound. Madam Jin looked hopeless — Jiang Yanli and Lan Wangji were consumed by rage.

And Lan Qiren?

Well-

'The leaders of the Wen Remnants — that's us,' Wen Qing pointed out, explaining the sect's demands. 'According to them, if you hand us over, this situation will be considered resolved.'

'Considered resolved.' So long as the unwilling knife and an innocent bystander accepted death, the rest of their family would not be punished for what had gone on. It was not fair. It had happened regardless.

When the near-future flashbacks had first begun — when the Wen had attacked the Jiang and the Lan — there was someone clearly responsible for the evil that had occurred. Wen Ruohan was rallied against and fought in the name of justice.

Wen Ruohan was dead now.

And yet evil remained.

(The past Lan Qiren, who had let go of all decorum to shout at Wei Wuxian over the inherent immorality of demonic cultivation, suddenly flashed into the present Lan Qiren's mind.)

Torches, bows, and blades were raised high. A mob several thousand people large shook the ruined courtyard with its deranged cheer.

"Kill the demon! Make sure he's dead!"

It didn't take long for those words to become a chant shouted by every cultivator gathered in the foreground there.

How funny. Jiang Yanli was not a violent girl. In fact, she had often been criticized for the exact opposite. Her plainness, lack of presence, and weakness were faults everyone knew about.

'So it's that plain Jiang Yanli,' a boy in the Cloud Recesses muttered.

"Kill the demon! Make sure he's dead!"

Yet, right now, a small, barely-acknowledged part of her couldn't help but imagine what it would feel like to bring this army down — to crush each and every cultivator here and slam them into the ground just like Wei Wuxian had done to a crowd just a few minutes before. They would be pressed against the stone tiles underneath them. Gradually, she could add more and more pressure. Eventually, they'd probably pop.

If she squashed them like bugs — if Jiang Yanli taught them true fear — would they still dare to try and hurt her kind, sweet, selfless brother?

(No. She'd make them unable to do that.)

"Kill the demon! Make sure he's dead!"

Her future-self's husband was dead.

(Her current fiance seemed to be thinking the exact same thing as her.)

(Of course he was. It wasn't really their fault. They were used to resentful energy being a controlled power used and manipulated by demonic cultivators. It was a natural force too, however. In the destroyed ruins of Qishan, which now had a sea of people practically salivating at the thought of blood, a thick layer of resentment had formed.)

It was disgusting.

All the cultivators there were painting Qishan red. Some did so with their shouts and screams and resentment; others, with the blood of the Wens that stained their hands.

(Some of those Wen had deserved to die.)

(Did that make up for the innocent who had been executed just a day ago?)

(Did that make up for the innocents who they were preparing to kill now?)

All the hate there burned red. All their torches burned red. The light left behind by the scattering of Wen Qing's ashes only increased that effect.

The fire that had burned her had been infinitely worse than the heat given off now.

It was red, red, red, red-

Fweeeeeet

Wen Qing had been looking down, having felt like she had seen more than enough of the sects' collective madness. However, at that moment, she looked up. Her heart skipped a beat.

That sound hadn't quite been a flute note. Rather, it was a whistle of wind, the airborne currents twisting unnaturally. At the exact moment, every single fire in the courtyard changed.

Emerald flames cast a green glow across the compound.

A smile stretched across Wen Ruohan's face.

(Both Nie Mingjue and Jiang Cheng were making the exact same expression.)

Crows circled above, the calling card recognizable to every watcher there. The resentment that had formed in the city, building up bit by bit overtime, settled at once. The once thick-cloud seeped into the ground. It was not quite subdued. Rather, it was lying in wait, ready to spring up at Wei Wuxian's next command.

Jin Zixuan's murderer had arrived. His power surrounded the Jin heir's family and friends.

And, upon realizing that, the boy in question let out a sigh of relief.

“It’s… it’s the Yiling Patriarch!”

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli called out.

Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen looked at each other, sharing a grin.

The sects had promised peace, then gone and prepared their armies regardless. If Wei Wuxian had still been paralyzed right now, he and the Wen remnants would have been ambushed in their own homes.

~~A strategy as dishonorable as the worst of Wen Ruohan’s crimes.~~

But that future would not come to pass. At that moment, atop one of the tallest towers in Qishan, a voice rang out.

“You claim to be righteous sects. ‘Kill the demon?’ ‘Make sure he’s dead?’ I thought, as sect leaders, you would know better than to go back on your words.”

He looked down. A full moon shone blindingly behind him, casting his entire body in shadow. However, even without having heard his voice, the watchers would never mistake who it was.

Wei Wuxian.

Wei Wuxian!

Wei Wuxian!

Wei Wuxian!

A substantial, nearly-potent relief had spread throughout the watchers.

“A-Ying,” Wen Ruohan muttered, looking up at the moonlit figure with nearly-crazed eyes.

It had been Wen Ruohan’s war that had brought the Wen Sect to the meager few it was now. It had been his carelessness that had turned Wei Wuxian into a demonic cultivator hated by all. This scene right here was the physical manifestation of all his future self’s mistakes.

And yet…

‘Kill them,’ Wen Ruohan thought, his eyes gaining an icy glow. ‘They said you killed three thousand people in one night. Kill them and make them fear you like they once feared me. Show them what it means to lie to us.’

Bloodlust spread throughout the room.

(Jin Guangshan, who had moved to the back some time ago, looked around himself like a skittish animal preparing to run.)

“Wei Ying,” the simulated Jin Guangshan acknowledged. “You…. How dare you show yourself here?!”

Everyone moved to grab onto the hilts of their swords. Jiang Cheng’s pupils shrunk, blue veins lining the back of his hand.

If his other-self moved at all, the real Jiang Cheng was probably going to try to strangle him on the spot.

“Don’t. Do. Anything,” he hissed.

“How dare I?” Wei Wuxian asked back. “Why wouldn’t I dare to? Do the people here even add up to three thousand? Don’t forget that, back in the Sunshot Campaign, I fought against five thousand on my own before.”

Familiar numbers, as far as the simulation went.

‘I heard that he has another evil weapon. The Stygian Tiger Seal!’

‘Yes, don’t forget he has that. Or how he killed three thousand cultivators overnight!’

‘Five thousand if I’m not mistaken.’

It was the silly gossip of civilian townsfolk. It didn’t matter — not really. And yet, upon recalling those words, Madam Yu clenched her hands into fists.

‘You call that being allies? The Jiang raised him like their own, but almost all of them were killed because of him!’

Wrong on both fronts.

~~Because, just like her son, Madam Yu had never cared what the effects of her words might one day become.~~

‘Wei Wuxian has betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy. Yunmeng Jiang hereby expels him!’

It was amazing how easily rumors could spread.

But no one in the simulation cared much about rumors right now. Their eyes were all locked on the figure now eclipsing the moon. As crows circled ‘round and ‘round, the tension in the courtyard continued to rise.

“Jin Guangshan, you said that, so long as they turned themselves in, you would overlook everything that had happened.”

There were no protests from the crowd. Not even a single person gave a shocked gasp. Everyone knew what deal Jin Guangshan had offered them. Everyone had come here nonetheless.

“You should be happy. By appearing here, haven’t I granted your wish? No need for you to come all the way to my home tomorrow to scatter my ashes.”

Jiang Yanli looked down. The Burial Mounds were his ‘home.’ Of course they were; the Jiang Sect was now preparing to scatter his ashes. None of the people there knew what had really gone down on Qiongqi Path!

Except, if they had known, what would it change? They had already shown themselves to be willing to do all this.

Nie Mingjue’s expression went completely blank. If it weren’t for the simulation they were inside, he was certain he would have undergone a qi deviation ten times over.

At that moment, the simulated Nie Mingjue scoffed.

“Arrogant boy,” he muttered.

“A Nie disciple had been killed by Wen Ning as well,” Ouyang Zizhen helpfully piped up.

(So what would it matter how many Wen he planned on killing tomorrow? A dog had killed a human; that was more than enough reason to put them all down.)

In response, Wei Wuxian laughed:

“Haven’t I always been arrogant?” he asked.

(An arrogant person who took one third of a hunt’s prey when they weren’t the kind of person who was supposed to do that.)

“Sect Leader Jin, how does it feel, having to face your own words like this? Who was it that said he’d let this matter go if the Wen siblings went to Koi Tower and-”

“Let’s consider things as they stand!” Jin Guangshan countered. “At Qiongqi path, you slaughtered over a hundred of the LanlingJin Sect’s disciples — that’s one thing. Then, later, you made Wen Ning kill at Koi Tower!”

“Then let me ask you, Sect Leader Jin. At Qiongqi path, who was the one being ambushed? Who was the one ready to kill?”

An almost perplexed expression crossed Jin Zixuan’s face. He looked toward the simulated figure of his father. The man had laid out Wei Wuxian’s crimes clearly: he killed disciples of the Jin and had made Wen Ning attack at Koi Tower.

Not once, in that, did the words ‘you killed my son’ leave Jin Guangshan’s mouth.

Sure, Jin Zixuan was included in the ‘LanlingJin disciples’ category. He was one of the hundred Wei Wuxian had killed.

And yet, to not even bring up his name….

‘You’re not angry at what happened to me, are you Father?’ Jin Zixuan thought. ‘You’re not acting out of a blind rage right now. This war isn’t about me at all. You’re not seeking justice or vengeance. You want…’

Jin Zixuan’s eyes landed on the flute by Wei Wuxian’s side.

(What would Jin Ling think, if someone told him how insignificant Jin Zixuan’s death was to the world?)

At the very least, no one in the accumulated army found Jin Guangshan’s words strange. The crowd didn’t falter for even a moment, shouting protests and accusations Wei Wuxian’s way. What Wen Ning had just done was brought up again and again. Alongside that, in regards to Qiongqi Path…

“Even if Jin Zixun did scheme to ambush you first, you shouldn’t have been so heartless as to take so many lives!”

“Oh, of course they already know about that, too!” Lan Qiren scoffed. His short-lived fantasies of Wei Wuxian turning the tide by revealing that crumbled to dust.

“I see.” Wei Wuxian spoke calmly, but the resentment in the city churned with rage. “So if he wants to attack me, he doesn’t have to worry about whether it’s a fatal blow or not. If I die, it’d be my own bad luck. If I want to protect myself, however, I have to think about this and that and not cause harm, unable to damage even a single strand of his hair? In conclusion, you could all launch a siege against me, but I’m not allowed to fight back, is that right?”

It was. It so, so clearly was.

And, as Lan Wangji looked up at Wei Wuxian’s figure sitting under the moon, all he could focus on was how alone the Yiling Patriarch now seemed.

‘Hurry up,’ he begged his future self, his hands shaking just a bit. ‘Please, hurry up.’

But the next voice they heard was not Hanguang-jun’s. Instead, Sect Leader Yao stepped forward to speak:

“You call that fighting back? Those over a hundred and thirty people in Koi Tower were all innocent! If you were fighting back, why did you have to involve them?”

“The fifty cultivators in the Burial Mounds are also innocent! Why are you involving them?”

A man in red robes laughed, asking, “Just what great kindness have the Wen-dogs done for you? To have you side with scum like that.”

“In my opinion, there wasn’t any great kindness at all! He just thinks he’s a hero for fighting against the entire world. He just thinks he’s a great person, doing an act of justice that risks everyone’s condemnation!”

Wei Wuxian fell silent at that.

As did Jiang Cheng.

His eyes fell on his other self. The future's Sect Leader Jiang kept his gaze on Wei Wuxian, not even looking out at the crowd. Just like with the last conference, he didn't even seem to consider mentioning what Wen Qing and Wen Ning had done for him. The sound of rain began to play within Jiang Cheng's mind. Drop after drop came down, the noise reaching a deafening crescendo. And yet, despite that, the words his other self had once said remained clear:

'Why?! Why?! Why?!' Jiang Cheng shouted, his eyes going feral as he squeezed Wei Wuxian's neck with all his might. 'Why did you save Lan Wangji? Why did you have to speak up?! How many times have I told you not to stir up trouble?! Not to strike? Did you really want to play the hero that badly? Well, have you seen the result of you playing hero? Are you happy now?!'

Happy doing what was right, even if it seemed impossible?

'Attempt the impossible — that's our motto, A-Cheng,' Jiang Fengmian had once said.

And yet, when Wei Wuxian did:

"I've never met a creature as evil as you!"

The crowd continued to roar.

"How dare he come here now? Has he no shame?"

"A monster like him can't be reasoned with."

One man stepped forward, looking directly at Wei Wuxian as he shouted, "When it comes down to it, you were the first to act when you placed a curse on Jin Zixun!"

"Do you have any proof I was the one who placed the curse?"

"I…. Then-then do you have any proof you aren't the one who placed it?!"

"Nonsensical," Wen Qing cursed, the word coming out more harshly than any insult the dirtiest tongues could put together.

Wei Wuxian smiled at the blubbering man, his eyes gaining a sharpness the resentment adored: "Then let me ask you again — why couldn't it have been you? Do you have any evidence to prove you weren't the one who placed the curse?"

"Me? How could I be the same as you?"

Although he wasn't the one who said it, for a moment Nie Mingjue felt like his other self might as well have uttered those very same words.

“Don’t mix black with white! We’re nothing alike,” the man asserted. “You’re obviously the most suspicious. Do you think we don’t know? Everyone’s aware that you and Jin Zixun have held animosity toward each other since a year ago!”

(Except Wei Wuxian hadn’t even recognized him when he’d appeared.)

(Not that anyone here would believe that.)

Lan Wangji’s cold gaze fell upon the gathered crowd. He truly hated conferences. Even his future self apparently refused to participate in them. These were not the debates of the Cloud Recesses, where every statement would be checked and cross-checked before continuation. This was entirely different — it wasn’t a conversation at all.

~~And his other self still wasn’t here.~~

Finally standing up, Wei Wuxian turned to look down at the army before him, asking, “Who’s the one mixing black and white now? If I wanted to kill him, I would have done it a year ago. I didn’t have any reason to keep him alive until now. If not, I’ll forget such a person in three days, much less a year.”

True, perhaps. But the way it was phrased…

“He’s… saying Zixun’s too insignificant for him to remember?” Jin Zixuan asked. “Isn’t that just going to make this all worse?!”

“They won’t ever listen to any claims of morality A-Xian makes, will they?” Jiang Yanli muttered, not truly phrasing it as a question. “All he can argue with them about is whether he did this specific act.”

(And even that wasn’t going well.)

Exhaling in a half-laugh, half-sigh, Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes and pointed out, “A-Ying never tried convincing anyone of the Yiling Patriarch’s innocence. After being brought back to life, he simply accepted all the hate the juniors had. Initially, he was going to try to leave the cultivation world altogether. It’s like he’s given up on ever convincing anyone of that.”

And yes, Jin Zixuan was, objectively, dead now, but…

Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, Lan Qiren, Jiang Cheng, and Jin Zixuan himself had to hold back from viciously cursing at their other-selves. Madam Yu, Madam Jin, and Wen Ruohan weren’t far behind. The frustration within them turned to bitterness; the bitterness within them turned to hate. Those were their other-selves, yes. They knew now that everything the simulation showed them was what would have occurred — that every action their other selves did would have taken place.

And yet, right now, those people within the simulation seemed like strangers wearing their faces.

(Just a few weeks ago, that had been them. They had judged Wei Wuxian, blaming him for things they hadn’t understood.)

(The hate they felt now made it hard to breathe.)

(And Nie Huaisang, who had been keeping fairly quiet throughout this part of the simulation, hummed in thought.)

However, just as Jin Zixuan had feared, the comment Wei Wuxian made before stirred up the crowd's anger even more. It was nearly impossible to make any one voice out. The only exception to that was when a sect leader spoke, the people around them quieting down in respect at those times.

Among them…

"...Wei Wuxian, Wei Wuxian." Sect Leader Yao shook his head, looking shocked. "Today I've finally come to see… I've never met a villain as unreasonable as you are. Even after killing people, you have to shame your victims with words? Don't you hold any sympathy? Any guilt?"

There were cheers of agreement all around. A bitter sigh then came from one of the cultivators toward the front.

"Wei Ying, you… disappoint me so much," that cultivator said. "There was once a time in which I admired you. 'At least he founded his own sect,' I'd said. But now that I think back on it, it's almost repulsive! A sect of demonic cultivators. From this moment on, I'll forever stand opposing you!"

Upon hearing that, Wei Wuxian nearly exploded with laughter, cackling so hard he wasn't able to breathe.

It wasn't a pleasant sound. Jiang Yanli winced.

"You admired me?" Wei Wuxian asked. "How funny. You say you admired me, but I never once saw you during that time. Yet, as soon as I'm loathed by everyone, you jump out and wave a little flag to cheer in support. Your admiration is a bit too cheap, isn't it?"

Lan Wangji hated politics. He hated these sorts of conferences. He hated the lies and the deception and the flattery. Most of all, he hated this.

"Fine then." Wei Wuxian seemed to shrug. "Does the fact that you're standing opposite me affect me at all? Your admiration and your contempt — they're both so insignificant. How are you not embarrassed to parade them around like-"

THWACK

Wei Wuxian stopped.

He looked down.

An arrow was sticking out of his chest.

"Who dares?!" Madam Yu demanded, her voice coming out more harshly than ever before. Every watcher turned in the direction the attack had come from.

A young cultivator stood, staring up at Wei Wuxian, his arm still extended and his bowstring still vibrating from the force.

"I got him!" the cultivator shouted, his eyes lighting up with glee.

Lan Qiren, Nie Mingjue, and Jiang Cheng went even more pale than before. An entire army was there, but no one was trying to stop that cultivator. No one had even considered it.

Wen Ruohan's spiritual energy gained a level of animosity so intense it could almost be mistaken for pure resentment. Jin Guangshan shuddered at the sight.

The arrow sticking out of Wei Wuxian's chest was right above his heart. A centimeter down could have been fatal.

'Especially,' Wen Qing realized, 'To someone without a golden core.'

Wei Wuxian was not dead, and yet no one would be able to deny that death had been the intention. It was that cultivator's lack of skill, not his mercy, that had thrown that shot off.

Wei Wuxian's skills had never been so dull.

In one smooth motion, he pulled the arrow from his chest and threw it down. The darkness and resentment surrounding him made the air feel thick with hate. The projectile landed with pin-point accuracy.

The young cultivator, whose chest was pierced by the blow, fell to the floor.

"Brother!" another youth to his side shouted, rushing to him. "Brother! Brother!"

Not even Jiang Yanli could look upon this scene with pity.

"He shot him," Madam Jin hissed, fury clear in her brow and voice. "He shot him. He shot him!"

The 'he' in this sentence was not Wei Wuxian.

(Wei Wuxian hadn't fired the first shot, after all.)

And yet, at that moment, chaos enveloped the crowd. The youth's sect leader, who had done nothing in response to his disciple's actions, ran forward, pointing a finger up at Wei Wuxian and shouting with a horrified expression.

"You… you… you're so cruel!" he accused.

When Wen Ruohan gave a disbelieving scoff, no one even tried to discourage him.

Reaching down to press at the still-bleeding wound on his chest, Wei Wuxian gave an indifferent tilt of his head, asking, "What does 'cruel' mean? If he dared to shoot an arrow at me while I was off guard, shouldn't he have known what would face him if he failed? You all call me a cultivator of the crooked path anyways, so you can't expect me to be generous and overlook this, can you?"

"No one would overlook this regardless," Lan Qiren said.

The crowd, however, disagreed.

Ignoring all of that, Wen Qing stared intently, not even glancing at the figures who spoke and instead keeping her eyes locked in on the wound at Wei Wuxian's chest. Although his robes covered up most of it, the injury was still clearly there.

(And her future-self, the only one who knew Wei Wuxian had lost his core, was literal ashes in the wind by now.)

Shouts and protests continued without rest.

"You see?" Wen Ruohan spoke up, speaking low enough that only Wen Qing could hear. "These are the people you betrayed us to save."

(Ones who, if Wen Ruohan were in charge, would never dare to speak up in such a way.)

"I betrayed the sect to save Wei Wuxian," Wen Qing responded. "Even you can't complain about that."

Wen Ruohan didn't respond to her counter, keeping his eyes firmly on the crowd before them. Wen Qing, meanwhile, kept her gaze on Wei Wuxian and Wei Wuxian alone. Neither said another word.

But the simulation did not stop for them. Finally snapping out of his shock, Jin Guangshan turned to his disciples and gave orders at once.

"Set up the battle arrays! Set up the battle arrays!" he commanded.

The was enough to kick the rest of his sect into gear. They began moving at once, rushing to the edges of the hall. Great beams of light shot into the sky a moment later.

Jin Guangshan's commands were absolute.

"We won't let him leave alive no matter what!"

"Jin Guangshan!" Madam Yu shouted, turning venomously toward him. Though there was plenty they could have said, neither she nor Jin Guangshan had a chance to respond.

A loud roar filled the air. Thousands of people had drawn their swords and were now running toward Wei Wuxian. The Jin were not the only ones who moved. The Nie unsheathed their sabers, lining up. The Lan pulled back, knocking arrows onto bows and beginning to aim. The Jiang rushed forward, ready to attack.

(They all aimed to kill.)

"You fucking lunatics!" Jin Zixuan shouted. "Stop it! I'm telling you to stop!"

At Qiongqi path, Wei Wuxian had been ambushed by dozens of individuals. That was a mob that had hunted him down. This, right here, was an army. However, despite the near deafening shouts, all resentful creatures within the region could hear something else loud and clear.

🎵♪♪♪🎵♪

A hand broke out of the dirt, grabbing onto a charging cultivator's foot and sending him tumbling to the ground.

Wen Ruohan's eyes went bloodthirsty with glee.

More hands crawled out. Each one was thin and gangly — not from malnourishment, but from rot. The decay on them did nothing to hold back their strength. With unnatural ease, they pulled themselves out of the ground. Horror immediately formed on the faces of everyone there.

The watchers, on the other hand, didn't even widen their eyes in surprise. They distantly recalled how terrified they had been by demonic cultivation at the start, but, at the current time, not even disgust remained.

The simulated Nie Mingjue ran forward, his saber clashing against the claws of a fierce corpse — of a Wen. Every member of the Wen Sect who had died in the Nightless City rose up once more. Every cultivator from the other great sects who had died in the final battle rose up as well. It didn't matter what side they had been on; all dead obeyed Wei Wuxian just the same.

A Wen corpse pounced, biting straight through the neck of a cultivator who had, only thirty seconds ago, spat at Wei Wuxian's name and drawn his blade. He fell to the ground, dead, a moment later.

"Shixiong!" the cultivator to his side cried out.

That Shixiong in question laid on the floor for several seconds. The younger disciple fought off corpses as quickly as he could, struggling to get close. At long last, he managed to get to his senior brother's side.

His chest was pierced a moment later. His Shixiong, who he had rushed over to help, had awakened just a moment ago.

This time, as a corpse.

(Wei Wuxian's army had grown.)

Unnerving though this sight was, every cultivator who had taken part in the Sunshot Campaign was more than familiar with it. The more experienced fighters adjusted at once, continuing their assault. The simulated Nie Mingjue swung his saber, decapitating a Wen corpse on the spot.

Nie Mingjue wondered if his future-self would kill A-Yuan the same way.

Disgust filled him once more. At this moment, looking at his future self filled him with even more hate than looking at Wen Ruohan or Jin Guangyao.

"You called him unreasonable," Nie Mingjue recalled, breaking into a mocking laugh. "You really think you're in the right?! You all offered peace while gathering an army!"

His roar was loud enough to nearly knock Huaisang over.

(It was an accusation aimed at the wrong person. Technically, 'we' was the correct term to use here.)

(Except that the simulated Sect Leader Nie, looking up at Wei Wuxian with such scornful eyes, felt completely alien to the real him.)

The simulated Nie Mingjue charged forward once more. Fierce corpses were cut down in droves. Within seconds, another corpse's head was chopped off. This corpse did not fall, however, charging forward once more as though its own head was of no concern.

~~A few years from now, Nie Mingjue's own headless corpse would act much the same.~~

Nie Mingjue sliced an arm off the headless corpse. Its leg followed soon after.

~~Nie Mingjue would also become just a torso before long.~~

A Nie disciple nearly lost her arm to a corpse. Nie Mingjue cut it in half. He moved on immediately after, fighting without rest.

"Our disciples are there," Nie Huaisang observed.

"...They are," Nie Mingjue confirmed, his voice sounding dazed and slow.

"Why are they there?"

Nie Mingjue blinked once, caught a bit off guard, and looked over. Nie Huaisang stared back at him, eyes lacking the fear Nie Mingjue had been expecting to find.

"Da-ge, in all our fights about my training, you always got most angry when I ran away, right?"

Nie Mingjue could barely process the question he was being asked. He breathed in heavily, slow to respond. Eventually, he nodded.

“Right. You always wanted me to try. Mostly so I’d be safe-” Nie Mingjue nodded again, “-but also because you wanted to make me a righteous cultivator. A hero, or something like that.”

Nie Mingjue had never wanted Nie Huaisang to go quite that far. Even when they were young, it had been clear Huaisang wasn’t that kind of person. Nie Huaisang knew it as well. He would never be like that.

But-

“Da-ge, Wei-xiong was all that. He tried. He tried and tried and tried. He did everything he could to be righteous — to be a hero. He wouldn’t be standing there if all this was right.”

And Nie Mingjue, in this Heavens forsaken future, had brought an army to the Nightless City.

(Nie Huaisang had never been like this — had never wanted to be like this. But to watch someone try and try and yet end up this way…)

Countless arrows flew toward Wei Wuxian, pushed back by the wall of resentment that had formed around him. His eyes burned red from atop that tower. Nie Mingjue, standing on the ground, looked up at him with disgust.

“That is us. You — we — can’t excuse this with just ignorance.”

(Lan Xichen, listening from nearby, flinched.)

Nie disciples fell left and right. They were Nie Mingjue’s responsibility. It was his job to protect them. However, the current situation meant it was impossible for them to all leave alive. Soon, the gaze Nie Mingjue looked up at Wei Wuxian with turned to hate.

And all Nie Mingjue could picture was his other self leading them to Nightless City — to their deaths — without even trying to find out what was really going on.

They numbered in the hundreds, but the section with Nie cultivators was only a small part of the courtyard overall. Dozens of sects had come to this conference. All those sect leaders were now struggling to protect their disciples, fear etched onto their faces.

Which, in Wen Ruohan’s mind, was exactly how it should be.

‘You feared him all this time, but never enough,’ the Chief Cultivator thought. ‘Never in the way you feared me.’

Because, unlike Wen Ruohan, Wei Wuxian didn’t have an army full of cultivators at his disposal. He was a one-man army, but…

Arrows continuously flew Wei Wuxian’s way.

(If another one hit, if it actually speared his heart, this entire battle would be over at once.)

‘A-Ying….’

For a brief moment, Wen Ruohan’s smile disappeared.

If the Wen had Wei Wuxian, they would have won the war. For quite some time now, Wen Ruohan had been certain of that. In fact, if he’d had Wei Wuxian, he might not have started the war at all.

This thought of his went two ways, though.

(If Wei Wuxian had the full strength of the Wen, he wouldn’t now be fighting alone.)

“Protect the Sect Leader!” Jin Guangyao ordered, cutting down a low ranking corpse that approached. “Defend the sides!”

Disciples rushed to follow that command, swarming around Jin Guangshan protectively.

Wei Wuxian continued to stand at the top of the tower, alone. The notes on his flute were powerful enough to send approaching arrows flying back, but individual cultivators needed to be dealt with by corpses instead. Luckily, given the location of the battle, there were plenty of those to go around.

However:

A series of notes played rapidly. They were jarring and unnerving, not in themselves but rather for the fact that they cut through Wei Wuxian’s own song. Chenqing paused. Wei Wuxian looked up.

Lan Wangji descended, his zither still in his hands.

Lan Qiren and Lan Xichen both swallowed nervously. Lan Wangji himself marched forward, standing alert.

The simulation had brought them away from the battlefield below. Now, they stood between Hanguang-jun and the Yiling Patriarch. A heavy weight seemed to rest between them. The zither’s notes had disrupted some of the resentment in the air. Despite that, between the two of them, Lan Wangji looked by far the most affected.

At that moment, neither Lan Xichen nor Lan Qiren could bring themselves to look Lan Wangji in the eyes. They lowered their gazes to the floor, finding themselves watching the senseless battle below instead. It wouldn’t matter either way; the real Lan Wangji’s eyes were fixated on his other self at this point in time.

“Ah. Lan Zhan,” Wei Wuxian greeted.

The coldness of his voice was harsher than steel.

Lan Wangji looked from the battlefield to Chenqing to Wei Wuxian once more. He stepped forward, as though to approach Wei Wuxian, then hesitated again. The hostility directed at his other-self was easy to feel in the surrounding resentment.

A jar of alcohol was knocked out of the fifteen-year-old Wei Wuxian's grasp.

'Lan Zhan! Don't be so harsh! We're friends; if you let me go this time, I'll return the favor next time!'

The battle roared on below. Giving an empty smile, Wei Wuxian raised Chenqing to his lips once more. Hanguang-jun moved his hand toward his zither.

"You should have figured out long ago — the Purification Tone is useless on me!"

With a smooth motion, Lan Wangji flipped the zither onto his back, drawing Bichen from its sheath. His immediate attack was fast and powerful, directed straight at Chenqing as though he wanted to sever the flute in two.

The very first meeting the two of them had was a rooftop fight in the middle of the night.

Guilt pooled in Lan Qiren's core.

With a simple turn, Wei Wuxian dodged the attack. He had always been like that, his fast footwork making him nearly impossible to get ahold of. The mocking laughter that followed was a cruel reflection of how his voice had once been.

"Fine, fine. I always knew there would come a day when we'd have to fight for real like this. You always detested me anyways."

'Hey, Lan Zhan!' Wei Wuxian shouted, jumping up and down. 'Look at me! Look at me!'

"Alright, then. Bring it on!"

"Wei Ying!"

A book on pornography opened up in front of the second jade. His cheeks flushed bright red.

'Wei Ying!' he shouted.

'Here! I'm here!' Wei Wuxian cackled.

'You-!'

The Yiling Patriarch's mocking laughter cut through the real Lan Wangji's memory, tearing it to shreds.

"Wei Ying!" Hanguang-jun repeated.

Someone swallowed then cleared their throat.

“Although he shouted the words, Hanguang-jun’s voice was clearly shaking,” Lan Sizhui read out, speaking slowly. “However, right now, Xian-gege had already lost his judgement. He was half-mad, half-delirious. His mind magnified all ill will people had toward him until he was absolutely certain that everyone in the world loathed him. He, too, loathed everyone in turn.”

Jiang Yanli couldn’t breathe.

The battle continued on and on below.

“It didn’t matter who came at him. He wasn’t afraid. It was all the same. Everyone was the same.”

Jiang Cheng’s eyes fell on his other-self, who whipped Zidian around, bringing corpses down one after another. He hadn’t attacked first. Wei Wuxian had gotten his corpses to attack before the Jiang had done anything. It wasn’t his fault!

‘Our disciples are there,’ Nie Huaisang said.

‘...They are,’ Nie Mingjue confirmed.

‘Why are they there?’ the younger had asked.

That question had gone unanswered. Partly, it could be said, because the answer was so obvious. They had come because Jiang Cheng’s brother in law had been killed.

Which happened because Jin Zixun attacked Wei Wuxian.

Which happened because Wei Wuxian had ‘betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy,’ right?

In the far future, several children had been enacting this very scene. The battle at the Nightless City would undoubtedly be a popular one to play, given how many people were involved. At one point, the boy playing Wei Wuxian had been shoved to the ground, his ‘Stygian Tiger Seal’ breaking on impact. With teary eyes, he’d glared up at the other boys.

Two dozen arrows were fired at Wei Wuxian simultaneously, held off only by a thin wall of resentment.

‘Hey! Why did you push me?’ the child had asked. ‘It was all of you against just me! That’s not fair!’

A Jiang disciple snuck up from behind, preparing to chop off Wei Wuxian’s head.

Jiang Cheng couldn’t stand it. He suddenly fell to his knees, gagging and coughing on the floor.

“A-Cheng!” Madam Yu hissed, kneeling down next to him. “What happened?! Are you-”

“Shut up!” Jiang Cheng snapped back, speaking before his mind realized what it was doing. “How can you… how can you be worried about me when-”

“A-Xian!” a voice shouted.

Everyone froze.

Wei Wuxian looked over. A sudden clarity seemed to come over him.

A look Madam Yu understood at once.

(Even if everyone hated him, even if the whole world wanted him dead, the girl who had continued to peel lotus seeds for him despite her mother’s shouts would never want that.)

But-

“A-Li…” she trailed off. “What… are you doing here?”

Chenqing fell to Wei Wuxian’s side.

“Shijie?” he asked.

Jin Zixuan paled as well.

The simulation brought them down. The battle below was a chaotic whirlwind. Corpses and cultivators fell one after another, dressed in robes of various colors and shades. Every human who died would join Wei Wuxian’s army, making it nearly impossible to tell friend from foe. In that mess, the new Madam of the Jin sect stood alone, looking this way and that.

“A-Xian?” she asked.

“A-Li, you should get out of there,” Jin Zixuan said. “You can’t — it’s not safe!”

(Wei Wuxian had killed her husband. However, just like Wei Wuxian, not a single watcher thought there was any chance of Jiang Yanli wanting him dead.)

The watchers’ positions switched so that they were directly in front of Jiang Cheng. The simulated Sect Leader Jiang threw off a few corpses with a swing of Sandu.

“A-Xian?” Jiang Yanli called out again.

Jiang Cheng went white.

“A-Jie? A-Jie!” He swung again, cutting another corpse to pieces. “Where are you? Where are you?!”

Their view switched back to Jiang Yanli, who was still surrounding by fighting on all sides.

“What are you all doing?!” Madam Yu snapped. “Someone get her out of there!”

Wei Wuxian jumped down from the roof of the palace, running through the battlefield with a crazed expression and shouting, "Shijie? Where are you?! I can't see you!"

"Hurry up, Wei Wuxian!" Madam Yu urged.

Madam Jin pressed her hands together, worry filling her whole. Wei Wuxian had been involved in the death of Jin Zixuan, but, of everyone here, he and Jiang Cheng were the only ones who would prioritize keeping Jiang Yanli safe.

"Hurry," she agreed.

Swords and arrows came at Wei Wuxian from all sides. He pushed through with his bare hands, ducking under shots and punching through any swordsmen who got in range.

"Shijie?!" he shouted. "Shijie?!"

"No, no, no, no…" Jin Zixuan mumbled, biting his lip. "Hurry up. Get her out of there."

Either Wei Wuxian or Jiang Cheng. So long as they got to her-

"But what if…" Jiang Yanli paused, swallowed once, then continued, "What if I can help?"

"How would you help here?!" Madam Yu demanded. "Be reasonable, A-Li. None of the stray arrows are going to care how well you cook! Don't you ever do this!"

But Jiang Yanli, still filled with an anger she had never experienced before, shook her head.

"A-Niang, I can't just let this happen! I can't do nothing! If I can convince them to stop-"

"No one's going to stop now!" Madam Yu snapped. "It became too late for words the moment A-Xuan died!"

Jin Guangshan nodded in agreement, adding, "As sad as it is to say, there will be no reasoning with either side now. We've passed the point of no return."

"That point was passed when you let A-Xun try to ambush Wei Wuxian!" Madam Jin snapped back, making her husband flinch. "Ambushing an invited Sect Leader — look at what's happened because of all that! If you weren't so-"

"A-Jie?" Jiang Cheng asked.

Everyone looked over.

Wei Wuxian's eyes were wide. Swords, talismans, and other weapons still came at him from all sides. It was like he was wading through a muddy swamp, unable to move more than a few steps at a time.

~~Lacking his sword. Unable to fly.~~

None of that disguised his panic, however. For, at that moment, he had finally laid eyes upon the pure white Jiang Yanli. Her eyes were wide with fear, but her movements were slow and full of exhaustion. Countless people stood between Wei Wuxian and his goal. Their bloodlust was a barely-noticed inconvenience compared to what was in the distance.

Behind Jiang Yanli, a newly-decapitated fierce corpse stood up once more.

"No." Jiang Cheng tensed. "But Wei Wuxian wouldn't-"

The mostly-rotted corpse raised a rusted sword. Jiang Yanli still hadn't turned its way.

"Get lost!" Wei Wuxian ordered. "Get lost right now! Don't touch her!"

A command of resentful energy. One the watchers were now quite used to.

But…

Kill them — stop them — they want to kill the Wen! They killed you, your brothers — kill him in turn! Don't touch her! They want the rest of your family now — hate them, hate them, hate them, hate them — kill him — kill her — kill him — don't touch her! — kill him!

The command could barely be heard. Wei Wuxian's panic mounted. More and more energy was put into his newest command. And yet…

Kill him — kill him — kill her — don't kill her — kill him — kill her — kill him — kill him — don't kill her — kill-

Lan Qiren squinted his eyes shut, the clashing commands grating at his skull. The intention was strong. The power behind that command was immense. However, in this land full of resentment and enemies and threats, asking the legion of corpses to avoid a single girl was nearly impossible.

But, if that was the case-

The simulated Jiang Cheng, upon laying eyes on his sister, felt death come over him.

"Make it go away!" he shouted at Wei Wuxian.

He threw Sandu, but, in the chaos of battle, could only watch as another cultivator's sword obstructed the path of his own. Wei Wuxian reached a hand out, commanding the corpse again:

Don't hurt her!

He ducked down, avoiding a saber that nearly took off his head. He shoved that cultivator down.

"Stop!" he commanded.

His voice was lost in the crowd. Three arrows came at him at once.

Stop it.

That went unheard.

Back off!

Nothing responded.

Bit by bit, the resentment became even more chaotic than before. The conflicting commands swirled together, jutting into each other and clashing horribly. Wei Wuxian's panic grew.

Stop stop stop stop stop stop stop stop stop stop stop stop-*

With a gasp, Jiang Yanli fell to the ground, her knees giving out from under her. Nie Huaisang was in a similar position, unable to resist the heavy wave of resentment. Lan Qiren wasn't far behind.

Wei Wuxian's panic grew and grew.

As more and more of the commands contradicted, the control Wei Wuxian had over the surrounding creatures lessened. He might have been able to do this if he was calm — he might have been able to do this if the number of corpses he controlled was small — he might have been able to stop this if he wasn't being attacked every second or so. However, the corpse raised its blade.

"Stop it, stop it, right now — stop it!"

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked.

The corpse struck down, cutting through Jiang Yanli's back.

"A-Li!"

"Miss Jiang!"

"Maiden-"

"Miss-"

"A-Jie!"

"Jiang-guniang!" Wen Qing shouted, rushing over to the simulated girl's collapsed form. She knelt down at once, trying to turn Jiang Yanli over to better see the wound.

Her hands only phased through instead.

A sword glare flashed forward, slicing the responsible corpse in two. Bichen flew back to its master a moment later. Neither Wei Wuxian nor Jiang Cheng had a moment to thank him, however. Both ran forward to Jiang Yanli.

Lan Xichen did the same, not able to spare even a moment to view the expression on his simulated brother's face.

~~He'd brought an army here. He hadn't investigated further before going; he was partly responsible for this. If Jiang Yanli died here-~~

Jiang Cheng made it there first, picking his sister up in his arms. But, right before Wei Wuxian could reach Jiang Yanli, Lan Wangji grabbed him by the collar.

"Wei Ying! Stop the corpses!" he commanded.

Not even seeming to hear the words, Wei Wuxian simply pushed Lan Wangji away, running to Jiang Yanli immediately after.

"A-Li," Madam Yu whispered, her voice shaky and confused. The sight of Jiang Yanli on the battlefield had been terrifying for her, but it had been the stray weapons she had truly feared. The thought that one of Wei Wuxian's corpses would hurt Jiang Yanli…

In the moment, it wasn't something she'd even considered.

(The resentment's fear increased tenfold.)

Jiang Yanli's white robes had been dyed red with blood. Jiang Cheng held two fingers to her neck, checking for a pulse. Short breaths were continuing to come out of her. When Wei Wuxian approached, Jiang Cheng threw a sudden punch toward his face.

"What happened?!" he demanded. "Didn't you say you could control it?! Didn't you say it'd be fine?!"

He was right to be angry. He was completely and totally right.

(If he hadn't brought an army to this event, he would even be justified.)

As it was, not a single person could be happy with what was being shown.

'I should have stopped him,' Lan Wangji thought. 'If I had given him the help he needed — if I'd made sure he didn't need demonic cultivation to protect everyone…'

His eyes dropped down to where Wei Wuxian's core should be.

'…Wei Ying-'

That thought didn't have a chance to complete, however. Wei Wuxian, thrown back by the punch, stumbled and fell to the ground. His eyes were exhausted and haunted, but his face was frighteningly blank.

"I… don't know either," he admitted. "I can't control it. I just can't control it."

Wen Ruohan's expression darkened. The resentful energy surrounding them was becoming less and less restrained as time went on. It was now a maelstrom, bringing about destruction and death with wild disregard.

(It almost felt like the Burial Mounds had once been.)

It was-

Suddenly, Jiang Yanli twitched.

"A-Jie?" Jiang Cheng called out. "A-Jie, it's fine! It's fine. It's not that bad — just a little gash. It's not that bad. I'll take you away from here right now."

Jiang Yanli's blood continued to pool on the floor.

"A-Li!" Jin Zixuan clenched his teeth together, kneeling by her simulated-self's side. "I'm sorry! I'm sorry I-"

Both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan's words were cut off by a soft whisper from below.

"...A-Xian."

While Jiang Cheng froze at Jiang Yanli's voice, Wei Wuxian reacted at once:

"Shijie, I… I'm here," he assured.

When facing the gathered troops, Wei Wuxian had displayed anger and disgust. Now, for the first time, he showed visible fear.

(If Jiang Yanli cursed at him, that might be enough to truly send him over the edge.)

"It wasn't his fault, A-Li," Jin Zixuan whispered. "I'm sorry. I invited him but… I didn't see what was going on until it was too late."

Madam Jin frowned and opened her mouth, as though about to object to her son's phrasing, then closed it again. Right now, accepting his words felt like her only option.

But, of course, their words would never be able to reach the woman herself. Jiang Yanli opened her eyes, the simple act almost being more than she could manage. She looked around then, at last, found Wei Wuxian's face.

While blame could be debated, it was by Wen Ning's hand that Jin Zixuan died. If the simulated Jiang Yanli blamed Wei Wuxian, no one would be able to rebuke her for it. Even Wen Ruohan, despite his earlier reactions to accusations against Wei Wuxian, seemed accepting now.

Then, at last, Jiang Yanli spoke:

"A-Xian…. Back then… why did you run away so fast?" she whispered. "I didn't get the chance to look at you… or say anything to you…."

The resentful energy around them fluctuated, pulsing faster and faster in tune with Wei Wuxian's racing heart. He continued to look at the ground, not able to meet her eyes.

An equally dirtied and bloodied face — Jin Zixuan's — overlapped on top of Jiang Yanli's for a moment.

Jiang Cheng's mind whirled in a self-destructive cycle.

'He killed A-Jie. He killed A-Jie!'

For days, Jiang Cheng had been sure that was a lie. There had been lies before. His own future self had lied before! This one, among all others, couldn't be true. He hadn't believed it. Wei Wuxian wouldn't. Wei Wuxian would never.

'He killed A-Jie! He murdered her!'

It was a complicated situation, sure. It was hard to deal with. Wei Wuxian had tried to make the righteous choice.

~~By choosing the Wen over the two of them!~~

He said he wouldn't lose control. He lost control! How could he possibly think creating something like demonic cultivation was justified?!

~~But they knew exactly why.~~

He shouldn't have used it here! He could have run away! He always chose to play the hero at their expense!

~~He'd only come because they'd killed his friends and promised peace.~~

He should've should've should've should've-

Surrendered? Backed off? Run as soon as he saw her? He couldn't — he couldn't even control his own corpses right now!

~~And whose fault was that?~~

A week or two ago, the watchers had repeated an idealistic mantra almost-unknowingly. "At least nothing can be worse than this," they'd said time and time again. No one uttered such words now. They didn't even cross the watchers' minds. After all, the simulation had proven that things could — would — always get worse.

And yet…

"You killed A-Jie," Jiang Cheng gasped out, still not-quite believing.

Wei Wuxian trembled where he stood, fearing the words that were going to come next more than any others.

“I’m… I’m here to tell you…”

Jiang Yanli coughed out. Blood left her lips.

Wen Qing frowned deeply at that. However, as she examined and re-examined again, her brows began to furrow. Jiang Yanli was not a strong cultivator. She had not been eating or sleeping well in the past few days and her skin had been pale even before the attack. However, the fact remained…

“The Jin Sect’s doctors are reasonably skilled,” Wen Qing recalled aloud, making a number of tear-stained eyes turn her away. “She has some time left. If… if she gets to them before an hour passes…”

It was hard to tell for sure, but-

The resentment surrounding Wei Wuxian shifted once again. It became as thick as the Burial Mounds’ aura had once been. The crimson glow in his eyes was strong, but the intensity fluctuated up and down, displaying fear instead of power.

“Shijie…” he whispered. “Stop… stop talking. I’ll get you out of here right away!”

And yet, at that moment, he seemed scared to approach. The new Madam Jin looked up at him, still trying to speak.

Jiang Yanli looked down at her ~~always weak, always helpless~~ other self, praying that she would last just a bit longer.

‘What does she want to say?’ Wei Wuxian asked himself. ‘That it’s fine? That she doesn’t hate me? That everything’s okay? That she doesn’t blame me for having killed Jin Zixuan?’

Wei Wuxian nearly laughed at the thought.

‘Impossible,’ he was sure.

But then-

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli continued. “You should… you should stop first. Stop. Stop them.”

“I’ll stop!” Wei Wuxian assured her. “Yes, I’ll stop.”

He took up Chenqing, placed it on his lips, and began to play. Though his thoughts were panicked and confusing at first, the commands gradually began to align with one another. Little by little, his undead army obeyed.

Jin Guangshan nearly gaped in amazement. He kept forgetting, somehow, how much control this weak, fragile woman had over the Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation.

He would do his best to ensure that information didn’t leave him again.

The notes played.

One by one, the corpses stopped.

(One by one, the now unopposed cultivators began to turn their attention to this very scene.)

Lan Wangji glanced over briefly before turning back to the fight, continuing to bring down any corpses that had not fallen yet. Wei Wuxian, meanwhile, walked over and knelt beside Jiang Yanli's resting form. His hands shook with fear that, if he reached forward, he would somehow hurt her.

(Hurt her even more, that is.)

'He doesn't get to look at her like that!' some part of Jiang Cheng raged. 'He's the reason she's dead!'

And if he hadn't come, and Jiang Cheng did as he pledged in this very conference and cut off Wei Wuxian's head, what would Jiang Yanli have said to him then?

'The Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian is dead!'

'Really? Who killed him?"

'Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, leader of the Jiang Clan.'

Wei Wuxian's hands rested against the ground, slowly becoming stained with Jiang Yanli's blood.

Jiang Cheng could feel Wei Wuxian's blood dripping from his own hands just the same. Nausea rose up in his throat once more.

And yet, at this moment, neither Wei Wuxian nor Jiang Yanli looked at each other with any hate. There was only concern, worry, and love.

(Jin Ling would grow up hating Wei Wuxian.)

"Because he still killed-"

Jiang Cheng's words never finished. At that moment, Jiang Yanli's gaze turned to something behind Wei Wuxian. Her eyes widened. With a level of strength she had never shown before, she abruptly sat up and pushed Wei Wuxian back!

SHING

A moment later, a gleaming silver blade pierced through her throat.

"...A-Li?" Madam Yu asked. Her eyes, despite seeing just fine, couldn't register what had just occurred.

Blood poured from Jiang Yanli's mouth and throat. Her head went lopsided, all light gone from her eyes. She had been talking just a moment ago; she was a corpse now.

"You bastard!" the person holding onto the blade cried out. "This is for my brother!"

It was the person who had cried over that very first archer — who had cried over someone who'd attacked first, attacked unprovoked, and attacked without forethought or plans.

And yet, because of him-

"Huh?" the boy blinked through his tears, finally registering that he hadn't killed the right person after all. Wei Wuxian stared at Jiang Yanli blankly. Jiang Cheng, who still held her in his arms, didn't seem to have registered a single thing.

"An accident?" Lan Wangji muttered, eyes wide. "It wasn't even his mistake. Someone else..."

It was just an accident?

No. This wasn't 'just' anything.

Wei Wuxian's eyes were as wide as they could go. He looked up.

'A-Xian.'

Jiang Yanli's voice echoed in his mind.

And yet, right in front of him, her corpse laid still.

His steady, silver eyes turned red once more.

"Ah!" Jiang Yanli cried out, slamming against the ground. The resentment emanating from Wei Wuxian at this moment was thick and overwhelming, crushing her down. She struggled against it, but lacked the strength to push herself up. Even her brother had been forced to take a knee.

As for her other brother…

Wei Wuxian's crimson eyes looked up slowly, the heavy resentment around him shadowing the rest of his form.

"It… it wasn't me…" the boy protested, trembling a little. "I was going to kill Wei Wuxian. I was going to avenge my brother."

The very same brother who had shot Wei Wuxian to begin with.

“She just threw herself over on her own-”

The boy never had a chance to finish what he was saying. At that moment, Wei Wuxian’s hand shot out and snapped the boy’s neck.

Too easy — too fast. Something that couldn’t even begin to account for what the boy had done.

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli shouted. “A-Xian!”

Her protests, as always, would never be heard. Resentment spilled out, the feeling carried with it more clear than it had ever been before.

‘You were born with a smiling face,’ Jiang Yanli had told him once. ‘Always smiling, never minding sorrowful things. No matter what situation you’re in, you can always be happy.’

And yet, right now, the pure hatered carried in the surrounding resentment was overwhelming.

“Demon! Let him go!” Sect Leader Yao shouted, waving his sword.

Wen Ruohan looked his way, the gleam in his eyes promising death if that simulated figure tried anything right now. Madam Yu, meanwhile, could only stare blankly at the simulation. Even without resentment forcing her to remain in her seat, she wouldn’t be able to even think to move.

“You-! Back then, you caused the deaths of Jiang Fengmian and his wife!” Sect Leader Yao continued. “Now you’ve caused the death of your Shijie!”

“Huh?” Madam Yu asked, turning her blank gaze on Sect Leader Yao at last.

“Your suffering was the result of your own crimes, yet you dared to vent your anger on another!” he continued, gesturing at the corpse of the boy who had stabbed Jiang Yanli. “Instead of learning, you took another life. Wei Wuxian, your crimes will never be forgiven!”

“You shut up!” Jiang Cheng shouted. “This is all — how could you all-”

He couldn’t finish those words. The resentment was suffocating now. Wei Wuxian’s rapid heartbeat echoed throughout the simulation. He looked down, his breaths coming out faster and faster. He brought his hands up, burying his face in them. What he said next was not a response to Sect Leader Yao’s words nor an accusation of his own.

It was simply a scream.

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli called out one last time. The real one, of course; now, the simulated one was gone.

……

……

Wen Ruohan blinked once, breathing in deeply. The resentment at the Burial Mounds had been bad. What occurred just a second ago was incomparable as far as spirits could feel.

'Even during the battle, he was holding back that much resentment?' Wen Ruohan wondered. 'He wasn't using the Stygian Tiger Seal either.'

Because, as Wei Wuxian had mentioned, those weapons were far too powerful — involved far too little control.

'It's no wonder Jin Guangshan was willing to face the ire of the other sects to get access to Xue Yang.'

And wasn't that exactly why this had all occurred? Wei Wuxian was too dangerous to be so alone.

(Because of that, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan were dead.)

The Chief Cultivator breathed in one more time, finally feeling his headache ease. He looked up.

All around him, there were bodies strewn across the floor.

"What?" someone muttered from behind. Wen Ruohan glanced back to see Nie Mingjue picking himself off the floor. The chair he had been sitting on until a few moments ago appeared crushed.

Wen Ruohan looked down at his own chair, noticing the splinters and cracks that had formed. About half the chairs in the room had been demolished completely.

And yet, at the moment, that felt like a truly trivial concern.

"What was that?" Nie Mingjue asked. "What just-"

“I believe,” Wen Ruohan interrupted, “that we just witnessed the night Three Thousand Cultivators died.”

(Or five thousand, depending on who you asked.)

Nie Mingjue looked back at Wen Ruohan, his eyes wide.

“That’s-” he began, only to stop himself a moment later. Instead of continuing, he looked across the unconscious bodies on the floor for his brother. Huaisang, as expected, had collapsed just a little ways away. Nie Mingjue rushed over.

At the same time, Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji began to stir.

One by one, the watchers began to wake up and pick themselves off the ground. Even after that they breathed heavily, still vividly recalling the feeling of resentment crushing their legs, chests, stomachs, hands, heads — weighing down all the way to the tips of their fingers.

Emotionally speaking, they weren’t any better off.

“A-Li!” Madam Yu cried out, rushing to her daughter’s side. For perhaps the first time in her life, she attempted to hug Jiang Yanli. The rules of the simulation, of course, prevented that from happening. Her arms moved straight through her daughter, never making contact at all.

“A-Niang,” Jiang Yanli said, her eyes watering. “A-Niang, I-”

She stopped, swallowing back a cry.

“A-Niang!”

A little ways behind her, Jin ZIxuan stood still, his breathing becoming harsher and harsher. He swallowed a few times, flinching every time he heard Jiang Yanli speak.

Throughout this entire simulation, no matter what she had seen, Jiang Yanli had never cried like that. Her parents’ deaths had hurt her immensely, but even then this hopeless, desperate cry hadn’t appeared. Despite her lacking cultivation, Jiang Yanli was a woman Jin Zixuan admired. Her response to everything his simulated self had done gave her an air of maturity he could never hope to match.

But now…

“A-Niang!” Jiang Yanli cried again, falling to her knees and burying her head in her hands. She cried out over and over again, trembling like a child scared of a passing storm. Her tears began falling onto the in-between zone’s floor, disappearing a moment later. Nie Mingjue and Lan XIchen looked away from the scene. Nie Huaisang and Wen Qing frowned in pity. Madam Yu’s arms were still extended, trying, pointlessly, to envelop Jiang Yanli in a hug.

(She had never had to do this before. Madam Yu was not someone who gave comfort — Jiang Yanli was the one who gave it. In fact, the only times Jiang Yanli had ever really needed comfort…

Well, Wei Wuxian had given it to her then.)

"A-Li…" Madam Yu attempted, her gaze briefly turning toward her son. Jiang Cheng didn't seem to notice her at all, just gazing blankly at the ground between him and his sister for a while.

The red of Jiang Yanli's blood had stood out quite starkly on her mourning robes.

(For the tenth time that hour, Jiang Cheng felt like he was going to throw up.)

(He was far from the only one.)

"Who was that man?!" Madam Yu demanded, looking around desperately. "The one who stabbed A-Li! Did anyone recognize him?! What sect was he-"

"What good will knowing that do, Ziyuan?" Lan Qiren sighed. "He was little more than a single drop of water in a crashing wave. Punishing him won't solve anything at all."

"Then what?! You want to blame Wei Wuxian?"

Wen Ruohan laughed openly at that, pointing out, "You've always been the first one to advocate for that. A-Ying might have lost control in that moment, but, if it hadn't been for-"

"That's enough," Nie Mingjue growled. "We all know that already. By that point, this outcome was… inevitable."

"Was it?" Wen Ruohan asked. "If Jiang Yanli hadn't asked A-Ying to stop his corpses — to let the army attacking him go — she might have lived."

Lan Xichen's mouth dropped open at Wen Ruohan's audacity. Madam Jin looked too torn between anger and shock to do anything. Madam Yu looked a second away from sparking with electricity, having Zidian or not.

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan both flinched.

(It was almost funny, how well they suited each other. Both of them had run in on Wei Wuxian defending himself from an army dozens to hundreds to thousands of times greater than him, and both of them had asked him to stop. Helplessly watching cultivators gather against her brother had made Jiang Yanli furious. Yet, when her other-self did intervene, she only made things worse for Wei Wuxian. Neither she nor her husband had known the full situation at the time, but…)

(Well, it was much easier to get one person to stop than a thousand.)

(The first time, Wei Wuxian hadn't listened. The second time, he had. Neither worked out. Jin Ling was an orphan from infancy because the two of them only ever made things worse.)

A morose air fell over the watchers.

Jin Guangshan was standing in the back, watching the other sect leaders carefully. At this time, no one felt much like speaking. The sequence of events they bore witness to felt meaningless, in hindsight. All the rumors, all the hate, and Wei Wuxian hadn't even been the one to finish her off.

But that was the whole point, wasn't it? In Jin Guangshan's opinion, this segment had shown their grim reality quite frankly.

(Wei Wuxian's power would inevitably bring strife to the land. A power like that, especially one he couldn't fully control, was far too dangerous. A being like him could never live unleashed.)

"The next time Wei Wuxian contacts us, we should probably instruct him to stop his research into demonic cultivation," Jin Guangshan suggested. "Now that we have a way out, he doesn't need to learn more. It will be safest for everyone if he stops."

A few confused gazes turned his way, the suggestion seeming to come out of nowhere. Jin Guangshan gave a friendly smile.

"Just think about it," he continued. "If Wei Wuxian hadn't had demonic cultivation, things would never have gotten this far. Wei Wuxian wouldn't have been vulnerable after stopping his corpses if he wasn't used to having those. He can continue his research into talismen, of course, but it will be safest for everyone if he doesn't-"

"Demonic cultivation is not why this occurred."

The even-toned words left no room for refusal. The source, of course, was Lan Wangji.

Jin Guangshan narrowed his eyes, pointing out, "No one person needs that kind of power. The fear Wei Wuxian and his seal inspired in people is exactly what caused this to occur."

They had just witnessed that seal's power. Most of them had fallen unconscious from the sheer intensity of the resentment. No one could deny its strength. But-

"That same fear would have never happened if I had been the one to create demonic cultivation," Lan Wangji responded, just as evenly as before. Jin Guangshan narrowed his eyes.

'He was so much more endearing when he couldn't speak back to me,' Sect Leader Jin thought.

A shiver ran up Lan Xichen's spine for reasons he couldn't explain. A few moments later, he stood in front of Lan Wangji, blocking Jin Guangshan's sight of him. Nie Minjgue stepped forward as well:

"If you're outlawing his cultivation, you would have to outlaw the Nie Sect's cultivation, too," he declared firmly, clenching down to forcefully still his shaking hands. "In that situation, I would have lost control long before Wei Wuxian did. If anything, Nie cultivation should be outlawed before his."

Which would not happen unless Nie Mingjue himself wanted it to. Great Sects or not, the others could not force this. ‘Nothing has happened despite so many years passing. I’m sure it’s fine!’ ‘If Sect Leader Nie says it’s okay, it must be.’ ‘Beast-based cultivation? That’s exactly what I’d expect of them — why are you all surprised?’ It would hurt their reputation, of course. It might even weaken them until they stopped being a Great Sect. It would not be the end, however.

(At the beginning, when their sect was still new, it might’ve been enough to finish them off.)

(Wei Wuxian was new. The Great Sects, at the end of this, would kill him.)

(That didn’t make it right.)

“At-at the very least, we should be monitoring him more closely, shouldn’t we?” Jin Guangshan asked. “My sect, at least, needs more before it will feel reassured. We all saw how poorly things can go when Wei Ying loses control.”

An image of Jiang Yanli flashed into the watchers’ minds again. Tensions rose among the adults and the juniors flinched as if slapped. Nie Huaisang swallowed once; Jiang Cheng was shaking; Jin Zixuan eyes burned with tears.

“I-”

“Shut up!”

Everyone looked over at once. To Jin Guangshan's surprise, Wen Qing was the person who had just spoken.

“Shut up,” the doctor repeated. “I don’t want to hear another word out of you.”

She had watched herself be burned alive. She had watched Jiang Yanli die, unable to help. She had heard rumors of Wen Ning’s demise knowing full well that Jin Guangshan was keeping him locked away at this time. As the segment had gone on, Wen Qing's rage had gradually started to consume her.

“Maiden-”

“No. Enough. What you did — what you all did to Wei Wuxian — was never his fault! A-Ning killed Jin Zixuan and Wei Wuxian hurt Jiang Yanli, but nothing will make up for what you tried to do to him!” Wen Qing shouted, losing composure completely. “You cannot just sit here and pretend like you weren’t trying to-”

“I’m offering this suggestion to prevent that from happening!”

“If you think-!”

Click

“Hello!” Wei Wuxian greeted.

And that voice — calm, relaxed, and unafraid — stabbed straight through Jiang Yanli like the blade that had taken her other self's life.

Jiang Cheng couldn't look up. It didn't matter that Wei Wuxian wouldn't visually be there — Jiang Cheng was incapable of looking in the direction of that voice.

'I suppose you didn't have a mother to teach you?' Hitting where it hurts the most, huh?' the future Sect Leader Jiang had asked. 'Have you forgotten who's the reason Jin Ling had to face so many whispers behind his back? You're quite the forgetful old man. You've forgotten the things you've said, the promise you made, but don't you dare forget how his parents died!'

Jiang Yanli sat up suddenly, pushing Wei Wuxian back and taking the hit for herself. She had acted, in her last moments, to save Wei Wuxian.

'Don't you dare forget how his parents died!'

Jiang Cheng wanted to scream.

The complete lack of response the watchers had given seemed to concern Wei Wuxian a little. He attempted once more:

"Hello?" he asked.

There was a pause.

"...Hello, Wei Wuxian," Wen Qing greeted. Her voice still shook a little.

(Jin Guangshan remained silent, hoping she would soon calm and deciding to try to get his point across again once she had stopped being so hysterical about everything involving Wei Wuxian.)

"...Did something happen?" Lan Qiren asked.

(At this moment, not even he could look up in the direction of Wei Wuxian.)

"Ah. I had an update I thought you all might want to know," Wei Wuxian admitted. "We think we found Xue Yang."

Several watchers did a double-take, caught completely off guard. With everything that had been happening recently, the events of Yi City felt like the distant past.

(Distant future?)

Either way, it wasn't something any watcher felt ready to think about.

"...Good work, A-Ying," Wen Ruohan said.

"...Thank you," Wei Wuxian accepted hesitantly.

"Where is he now?" Madam Jin asked.

“He’s probably in town.”

“You let him leave?” Lan Qiren wondered.

(Normally, he would be far angrier about a prospect like that. Xue Yang was dangerous. Even in child form, it was careless to leave him alone. However, right now, Lan Qiren was just tired.)

“He’ll be back,” Wei Wuxian assured. “We’re still offering food to him; there’s no reason for him to stay away. If he goes to another town, he can go to one of our test centers there. Everyone involved knows to report to me if they find him.”

“But how could you just let him go?” Jin Guangshan demanded, pulling back as soon as he noticed Wen Ruohan’s gaze on him. “Xue Yang is a demonic cultivator in the future. Surely Jiang-xiong told you about his crimes.”

“He’s eight,” Wei Wuxian said. “I’m not going to imprison him for something he didn’t yet do.”

And, for all that Wei Wuxian had been happy to follow their instructions thus far, no one doubted his claims now. He had gone against them before; only Jiang Yanli’s request had made him back down.

“I’ll continue to be in contact with Xue Yang. If anything changes about the situation, I’ll let you know.”

Several watchers nodded absently.

That was fine. Probably.

(What happened at Yi City had been horrendous.)

(And yet, after what they had just seen in the simulation, how could any of the watchers put much energy into focusing on Xue Yang’s crimes?)

“...Anything you would like me to report back on?”

They could request for people they trusted to be attached to the communication array. There were people there who might even kill Xue Yang, if ordered to. They could make a choice like that. After someone else heard the order, it would be difficult for Wei Wuxian to stop them.

So what? Should they say that Xue Yang was too dangerous to be left free, even as a kid? That it was just in his nature to hurt others? That he was a beast that needed to be chained down?

(Wen Ning was a beast of Wei Wuxian’s. Wen Ning was not killed when he was supposed to be. If Wei Wuxian had not found their armies and the sects’ attack on the Burial Mounds had been successful, what would Jin Guangshan have done after getting his hands on Wei Wuxian?)

(Would he kill him?)

(Or would he-)

“We’re fine,” Wen Ruohan declared.

“Fine?”

“Use your own judgement when it comes to Xue Yang. We’ll leave that to you,” he said.

None of the watchers moved to disagree.

“...Ah. I’ll… take care of it then.”

It seemed as though he wanted to say something else. However, none of the watchers felt much like talking to him.

“Goodbye, A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli said, her voice empty.

“...Right,” Wei Wuxian agreed. “Goodbye.”

With a click, he was gone.

Chapter Notes

> Hi everyone! It's been a while. Thank you so much for your patience! This chapter doens't have much plot progression through the novel, but I hope it will be fun regardless. The last chapter gave the watchers a lot to discuss, and I wanted to add my own interpretation to the parts the novel skipped so that's what this chapter is. Hopefully we'll make more progress with the next chapter!

> (And hopefully that one won't take me quite so long.)

Jin Ling opened his eyes, gradually taking in the scene before him. A dark sky; fire-lit roads; crows flying overhead. Sound returned a moment later, marching steps in the distance growing louder as time went on. However, Jin Ling's other senses lagged behind.

There was nothing to smell.

There was nothing to taste.

The robes Jin Ling wore, which he could clearly see with his own two eyes, didn't register as any feeling against his skin. He and his adornments were as weightless as the air around them.

(No, it wasn't air. He wasn't even breathing.)

"...Wei Wuxian?" he called out.

"Over here. Give it a moment."

Then, at long last, Jin Ling managed to feel something hard against his feet. He tapped his toes against the now-apparent ground, taking in the subsequent sound. There was something resembling matter there — something he could push against and walk on top of.

Moving as clumsily as a newborn fawn, Jin Ling turned himself around.

Wei Wuxian looked back at him, giving a smile that didn't reach his eyes.

'...And then what happened?' Jin Ling had asked.

The death of Jin Zixuan had been outlined in full. Inevitably, information on Jiang Yanli's death followed. Many elements had been the same. As a result, this explanation took significantly less time than the first one had. Wei Wuxian had been scared, facing many people in combat, and been overwhelmed by isolation and betrayal.

He lost control, he'd said.

But-

'Your mother… chose to save me, right at the end.'

(It had not been the cause of her death.)

Jin Ling inhaled, not feeling any air come in but feeling forced into the familiar motion nonetheless. Human reactions couldn't just be turned on and off. According to Wei Wuxian, refusing to breathe here would not knock you out — would, physically, be no different from continuing to breathe. It would be immensely uncomfortable, however.

As seconds went by, Jin Ling relaxed and the flow of the matterless energy surrounding them began to feel more and more like the air of the outside world. By now, it was hard to notice the difference at all.

Good. Jin Ling needed to focus, for now.

Jin Ling had asked as many questions as he could. According to Wei Wuxian, Jiang Yanli had pushed her husband's killer out of the way of an enemy's strike. Wei Wuxian had injured her, but he didn't know how much. At the very least, she had been alive until then.

'Did A-Niang know that you killing A-Die was an accident?' Jin Ling asked.

Wei Wuxian shook his head.

'Why was she at the battlefield?! I thought she wasn't a combatant!'

'She said she had something to tell me.'

'Which was?!'

'...I don't know. She never got to say.'

Could there be a less satisfying response than that?

'You said… you were scared of my dad. What about my mom? Is that why you hurt her?'

*'No.'*

Wei Wuxian's answer was absolute.

'But-'

"No, no, A-Ling….' Wei Wuxian shook his head. 'Your mother would never have hurt me. I hurt her because of my own carelessness.'

‘Carelessness?!’ Jin Ling shouted back. ‘I’ve never seen you make a mistake like that! Not even once.’

Wei Wuxian remained silent, simply accepting the rage and skepticism.

‘Then… what happened next? What did you do then?!’

Taking care to not break eye contact, Wei Wuxian answered, ‘I used the Stygian Tiger Seal against the army. I didn’t care who I killed, by that point. Lan Zhan helped me get back to the Burial Mounds.’

It was an answer, but not an answer Jin Ling liked. He stood up, his confusion and apprehension spilling out into rage.

‘You told me you were going to explain,’ he bit out. ‘Why are you talking so vaguely?! You lost consciousness after killing my father and Wen Ning took you away. Fine! That makes sense. No one there was going to listen to you anyway. But what about here? You didn’t kill my mother! Why didn’t you talk to Uncle Jiang?!’

If he’d had time to think, Jin Ling could have answered that question himself. After all, Jiang Wanyin had attended a pledge conference to kill Wei Wuxian even before Jiang Yanli’s demise. Why would he be any more merciful than Jin Zixun now? How could Wei Wuxian possibly try to reason with him when people who wanted him dead were attacking from all sides?

(Talking with Jiang Yanli hadn’t exactly gone well.)

But-

‘Why use the Stygian Tiger Seal if you were just going to run?! What, did you want to make sure no one was able to stop you and Hanguang-jun? Did you want to make sure no one saw you two as you ran off together? To protect his reputation at the cost of your own? You don’t know why my mother was there; you’re telling me everyone is lying when they say you killed her! According to your story, Uncle Jiang saw all of this. He would have told me if that was what happened!’

(Would he really?)

(Would anyone?)

But Jin Zixuan’s death was orchestrated by people who Jin Ling could easily blame. Since the conspirers were the only people there, it was common sense to doubt the explanation those people gave. Jin Guangyao was involved too. He probably played some part in how the story was spread.

But not with this. Not here.

(The Yiling Patriarch was evil. The sects had united to bring him down in the name of justice.)

(The army of heroes had fired the first shot.)

'This doesn't explain anything!' Jin Ling had snapped. 'You can't expect me to be satisfied with this!'

'I'm sorry,' Wei Wuxian said.

There was nothing more he could offer than that.

'At that moment, after… my mom… did you talk to Uncle Jiang at all before you decided to run?' Jin Ling asked.

It had been an irrelevant question. It made no difference either way. All Jin Ling wanted was something — anything — to grasp onto.

'I… don't think I did,' Wei Wuxian muttered. 'I don't really know, I'm sorry. It was all… a blur. I don't really remember anything that happened after your mom died. Up through my death it's all just…'

A haze.

He didn't know.

He couldn't recall.

And, at that moment, Jin Ling made his choice:

'Show me the memories,' he requested. 'I need to see for myself what happened.'

Wei Wuxian's gaze softened with disappointment but lacked surprise.

'Okay,' he said. 'Come here. I think they're about to start.'

And now, they were here. It had taken only a minute or so for Wei Wuxian to set the Píngxíng Gateway up. That minute had proved valuable to the young Sect Leader, giving him a chance to calm down a little.

'I shouted at Wei Wuxian,' Jin Ling thought. At the beginning of their talk, he had promised himself that he would listen to what Wei Wuxian said with an open mind. If Wei Wuxian admitted to all the terrible crimes attributed to him, Jin Ling would accept that. It would be shocking to know he'd done that, but Wei Wuxian wasn't crazy anymore. Death had 'cured him' of the corruption — that was the story most people accepted now. Jiang Wanyin, who led the siege against Wei Wuxian, had been right to do so. The current Wei Wuxian, who Jin Ling knew now, would have reasons to be regretful.

He hadn't prepared for this, however.

'I asked him to explain,' Jin Ling thought. 'He did a fine job with what happened to my dad! It's not my fault he has no answers about my mom!'

He still probably shouldn't have shouted.

'If he would just answer fully I wouldn't have to!'

A thought occurred with a terrifying force.

'Did my shouts… wake up Hanguang-jun?'

(The man had been sleeping in an adjacent room, after all.)

Jin Ling really, really, really, really hoped not.

"Let's see…" Wei Wuxian trailed off, inscribing a character onto the ground with resentful energy. "Ah, here we go!"

The resentment glowed.

A moment later, a fire-lit street had surrounded them. In the seconds it took for Jin Ling to adjust to the sensation of going through the Píngxíng Gateway (breathing without breathing and feeling without truly touching), the people there came into focus.

"Wait… is that Uncle Jiang?!" Jin Ling squeaked. "He looks so-"

Perhaps fearing that this Jiang Cheng would somehow be able to hear him, Jin Ling cut off abruptly.

An unrecognizably young Jiang Cheng stood before him. The expression on the teenager's face was even less pleasant than his usual one. This wasn't the glare he often had when scolding Jin Ling nor the near-mad rage he showed when a suspected demonic cultivator was around. It carried a frigid chill that aged the sect heir significantly.

It was hard to believe that this boy, for all the years they had "watched" in the simulation, was still only fifteen.

Jin Ling stared.

Wei Wuxian gave a small, somewhat hollow chuckle.

Jin Ling stared some more.

"...Sorry, Uncle," he said at last.

The figure from the past, of course, did not respond.

Jin Ling looked around, taking the scenery in more fully. Quite a few people were still here. A soft, red glow emerged from the seal drawn onto the floor — the exit Wei Wuxian had instructed his younger self on making. Though Jin Ling couldn't help but gaze at the intricate symbols in awe for a moment, the watchers from the past paid the seal no mind. They all stood or sat tall, their eyes glued to the visions before them.

Below, a large courtyard was filled with so many people it would take a person hours to count them all.

Every last one of them was armed to the teeth.

Jin Ling swallowed once. He looked back.

A few ways behind him, Wei Wuxian was staring at the past's Jiang Yanli with an expression so pained Jin Ling nearly wanted to flee. He, for a moment, became unable to speak. For all that Jin Ling had felt he needed to see this, the impact it would have on Wei Wuxian was not something he could allow himself to forget. Finally-

"...Sorry," the young Sect Leader muttered.

Wei Wuxian didn't look over. For a while, Jin Ling thought he might not have even heard. But:

"Your mother… wouldn't have wanted you to see this," he said.

Jin Ling looked down, feeling a hot flush of shame. Once again, a temptation to give up and go back washed over him.

(But he had to see this. He had to.)

The memories moved in closer, bringing all the watchers to the table where Jiang Cheng, Jin Guangshan, Nie Mingjue, and Lan Xichen stood. Everyone's eyes turned toward them.

"This is the Nightless City," Wei Wuxian announced. "Just a few days after… I killed your father."

No excuse. No defense. In going through all this, Wei Wuxian was fully prepared for Jin Ling to blame him and him alone.

(That's what everyone else did, after all.)

In the memories playing out before them, Jin Guangshan stepped forward.

"Tonight, the LanlingJin Clan-"

"-the Qinghe Nie Clan-"

"-the GusuLan Clan-"

"-the Yunmeng Jiang Clan-"

"-and all other clans here stand united!" Jin Guangshan concluded.

Jin Ling turned, looking out at the swarming mass before him. The word 'crowd' wasn't enough to describe this sight. The Qishan Wen Sect's central courtyard was the largest one Jin Ling had ever seen. A smaller sect's entire compound could fit inside with room to spare. Despite that, only a few bits of ground were visible now. People were packed here so tightly that they resembled a flood or sea.

Jin Zixuan had just died. The Sects had gathered together for a pledge conference to declare their unity against Wei Wuxian. This, Jin Ling already knew.

Jin Guangshan was handed an ornate, glistening box. He held it high.

"Here lie the ashes of the Wen Sect's remnants!"

The crowd cheered.

As a watcher, Jin Ling's father flinched back.

At once, Jin Ling turned to look at the box with newfound intensity.

"Whose-" he began.

"Wen Qing's," Wei Wuxian responded at once, as though not wanting to hear the full question. "And Wen Ning's, according to Jin Guangshan."

"But Wen Ning-"

"Was kept imprisoned instead."

Jin Ling's mouth snapped shut. All the while, Wei Wuxian's eyes remained focused on his former Shijie.

Energy filled the box. Abruptly, it shattered.

"Qing-guniang?" the watching Jiang Yanli asked.

The question was shaky and cut off, nearly a sob. It wasn't meant to be answered.

For a brief moment, Wei Wuxian's eyes left Jiang Yanli. He turned toward a young woman wearing robes with a motif of the sun embroidered on top.

"Tonight, we scattered the ashes of the two leaders of the Wen Sect's remnants," Jin Guangshan announced. "Tomorrow… tomorrow it will be the rest of the Wen dogs and the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian!"

The cheer that broke out now was even more deafening than the one before.

Thus far, nothing Jin Ling had seen directly contradicted either side's story. No one had lied to him yet.

The watchers from the past looked murderous nonetheless. One, in particular, sent a shiver down Jin Ling's spine.

"Wei Wuxian… who's that?" he asked.

“Hm?” Wei Wuxian glanced over.

A man sat tall in the center of the room, his eyes nearly burning red with rage.

Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes, finding the figure familiar but only distantly so. The robes indicated his sect easily enough, but his age seemed strangely hard to place. It wasn’t Wen Chao. It wasn’t Wen Qing. At first, Wei Wuxian wanted to guess Wen Xu, but he had met the heir just a short while before.

(A-Yuan’s father was already outside of the Gateway’s effects.)

But then-

“Wen Ruohan, I think,” Wei Wuxian said, walking over to get a closer look. “I’ve only ever seen him from a distance, but… I’m almost certain that’s him.”

A chant was occurring in the simulation. The words ‘Kill the demon! Make sure he’s dead!’ were repeated on and on without rest. It seemed to be making at least half the watchers nauseous.

(Jin Ling wasn’t too far behind.)

“So he’s…” Jin Ling paused, cleared his throat, then spoke louder to be heard over all the chanting. “He’s the Chief Cultivator? Sect Leader Wen?”

“The one you all brought here and revealed the future to, yes.”

Jin Ling flinched.

The chanting was getting even louder.

“He looks… furious,” Jin Ling observed.

(Almost every watcher did.)

“Well, the sects that banded together against him are now gathered together in his former home to destroy what remains of his clan,” Wei Wuxian pointed out, satisfied with his analysis and turning back to Jiang Yanli. “Don’t worry. My younger self and I will do everything in our power to keep him from hurting your parents and uncle.”

The allied sects had defeated him once. Hopefully that would make Wen Ruohan hesitate before declaring war on the other great sects this time around.

(It had made Wei Wuxian want to leave the cultivation world altogether when he was first brought back.)

(Then again, Wei Wuxian knew annoying little about Wen Ruohan. The man’s power was undoubtedly great, but the former Chief Cultivator was little more than a symbol to people in Wei Wuxian’s generation.)

(Much like how the Yiling Patriarch once was to Jin Ling.)

At this moment, however, Wei Wuxian no longer had the ability to focus on Wen Ruohan. Jiang Yanli, watching the memory with an expression Wei Wuxian didn't dare interpret, took precedence.

Was she angry?

At who?

She looked like she was about to cry.

Wei Wuxian couldn't bring himself to ask why.

She was alive. Her skin was pink, blood moving thanks to a still-beating heart. The version of her in the playing memories was alive too, right now. Soon, however-

Fweeet!

Wei Wuxian paled.

The Yiling Patriarch had arrived.

Jin Ling looked up along with everyone else gathered in this moment. Wei Wuxian's moonlit figure captured everyone's eyes.

"That's… you?" Jin Ling asked.

Pale. Gaunt.

Was it just the moonlight that made him look that way?

His hair fell down his back, the ponytail Jin Ling was used to nowhere to be found. This body was taller than Wei Wuxian's current one — a fact obvious even at this distance. The back lighting blocked out most of his features. From his position on the roof, he almost resembled a vulture.

Crows circled overhead.

"What's… this feeling?" Jin Ling asked.

(Unlike the watchers, he had not yet had time to grow sensitive to resentment yet. At this quantity, however, even a civillian would notice something was off.)

"It's… it's the Yiling Patriarch!" someone shouted.

The Patriarch's attention was directed toward the crowd.

Jin Ling couldn't breathe.

"A-Xian!" someone shouted.

The sheer relief in the speaker's tone tore through the current atmosphere in a jagged fashion. Both Wei Wuxian and Jin Ling looked back.

The watching Jiang Yanli's eyes were shining with relief.

Some ways behind her, Jin Zixuan was smiling brightly.

Madam Yu was smirking; Madam Jin nodded once; Jiang Cheng had an almost vicious grin; Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen looked at each other, sharing a smile.

"Shijie?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Jin Ling sucked in a breath of air.

Wei Wuxian and Jin Guangshan began to talk. They threw insults back and forth, anger seeming to rise with every word.

Neither of the two visitors were listening, however.

"Shijie, why…" Wei Wuxian trailed off. "She must… she must not have realized what's about to happen."

Jin Ling, meanwhile, couldn't help but look at his father's reaction.

"They've already seen A-Die's death, haven't they?" he asked.

Wei Wuxian hesitated.

"I thought so, but… it is going out of order," he pointed out. "I've been keeping tabs on them so I know they've at least seen brief glimpses. Maybe they've… only seen part of that day?"

It didn't make much sense.

On the other hand, if they really had seen him lose control like he did, then how could any of them be looking at him this way?

The talk between Wei Wuxian and the gathered cultivators continued.

"Even if Jin Zixun did scheme to ambush you first, you shouldn't have been so heartless as to take so many lives!"

'So, he was telling the truth about that,' Jin Ling thought.

He hadn't doubted it, but there was a difference between not doubting it and knowing that everyone here had heard those words spoken without raising a complaint.

(Why had no one mentioned who attacked first? Jin Ling had heard retellings of that day nearly countless times. Surely that would have been mentioned once, even if by accident?)

And-

“Wei Ying, you… disappoint me so much,” that cultivator said. “There was once a time in which I admired you. ‘At least he founded his own sect,’ I’d said. But now that I think back on it, it’s almost repulsive! A sect of demonic cultivators. From this moment on, I’ll forever stand opposing you!”

Upon hearing that, Wei Wuxian couldn’t help but laugh.

“How funny. Your admiration is a bit too cheap, don’t you think?”

“A-Ling,” the real Wei Wuxian said. “Look away for a moment.”

Jin Ling refused.

“Fine then.” Wei Wuxian seemed to shrug. “Does the fact that you’re standing opposite me affect me at all? Your admiration and your contempt — they’re both so insignificant. How are you not embarrassed to parade them around like-”

THWACK

There was an impact. Wei Wuxian jerked like someone had shoved him back. He looked down.

An arrow was sticking out of his chest.

At a time like this, Jin Ling couldn’t help but recall a different version of Wei Wuxian. The one who, in Koi Tower, had never once intended to hurt Jin Ling. The one who Jin Ling had stabbed a sword into nonetheless.

“I got him!” the young shooter cheered.

Older than Jin Ling, but not by much.

(Once again, Wei Wuxian had told the truth.)

(Once again, it seemed like everyone else around Jin Ling just wanted to lie.)

The memories’ main viewers jerked back in shock at the sudden attack. A few shouts filled the air. The memories then showed Wei Wuxian pull the arrow out of his chest and throw it back to the initial shooter. The boy was dead a moment later.

“Brother!” his companion cried out. “Brother! Brother!”

Meanwhile, the watchers seemed overcome with rage.

“He shot him,” Madam Yu hissed. “He shot him. He shot him.”

The condemnation washed over Wei Wuxian easily, not lingering in his mind. He had killed Madam Yu’s son-in-law. It was only natural for her to react this way to seeing him kill another.

Matching Wei Wuxian's own memory of the day, the young archer's sect leader pointed a finger up at Wei Wuxian, accusing "You… you… you're so cruel!"

Wen Ruohan gave a disbelieving scoff.

Disappointed that his own cruelty was so easily forgotten in comparison to Wei Wuxian's?

At this point, the battle had begun. Jin Guangshan shouted orders at his forces and the other sects moved to join in. The corpses raised by Wei Wuxian's flute proved to be worthy opponents for the united force. So many people were shouting and fighting that making out what any one person was saying was nearly impossible.

Jin Ling didn't need to be able to hear them to see, however. And, as the battle began, a look of absolute horror crossed the real Jin Zixuan's face.

"You fucking lunatics!" he shouted. "Stop! I'm telling you to stop!"

Jin Ling's eyes widened.

So much of the context behind this moment was unknown to him. It was hard to say definitively who was in the right (even if, emotionally, he wanted it to be Wei Wuxian). The watchers, however, had as much context as they could get. This whole alliance had formed in response to Jin Zixuan's death — the watchers had to know what happened.

And yet it was the Jin Sect, not Wei Wuxian, who became the target of Jin Zixuan's rage.

Hands broke out of the dirt. One by one, corpses rose. It was a sight Jin Ling was more than familiar with after everything he'd experienced with Wei Wuxian. However, now, it was on a scale he had never even fathomed.

The young sect leader swallowed, commenting, "I thought you said… they'd exaggerated what happened this night."

"They had," Wei Wuxian confirmed. "This definitely isn't five or ten or however many thousand they told you I killed. Barely three thousand people are here. There's four at most."

For the first time, Jin Ling understood the absolute terror in cultivator's voices when they mentioned the Yiling Patriarch. Growing up, Jin Ling had been furious at their cowardice. To people who were there that night, however…

"Why are they there?" Nie Huaisang asked.

Jin Ling, who had been lost in thought for the past few seconds, blinked and refocused.

"You wanted to make me a righteous cultivator," not-yet-Sect-Leader-Nie said. "A hero, or something like that."

Jin Ling nearly squirmed, thrown off by the youthful honesty of a sect ~~leader~~ heir twenty years his senior. It was strange and unnatural, seeing him so young. It was-

“Da-ge, Wei Wuxian was all that,” Nie Huaisang declared. “A hero.”

No one disagreed.

(Instead, they turned to look at the scene before them with unbridled hate.)

(And Jin Ling’s own uncle, a man who had never hesitated to hunt down anyone he suspected of being Wei Wuxian, looked at this time’s Jiang Wanyin with the most hate of all.)

Jin Ling felt his hands start to shake.

(All the while, Wei Wuxian gazed blankly at Jiang Yanli, not seeming to hear a word that was said.)

The battle went on. Lan Wangji arrived, standing opposite Wei Wuxian.

Jin Ling half-expected his 'uncle' to swoon at the sight of his beloved husband.

(He didn’t. He kept staring at Jiang Yanli.)

And Jin Ling’s expectations found themselves subverted once again as Hanguang-jun — the man who fought off all other sects to escape with Wei Wuxian — unsheathed his blade to fight his future husband. Wei Wuxian dodged his attacks, shouting back without a trace of warmth.

“I always knew there’d come a day when we’d have to fight for real like this. You always detested me anyways.”

Both Lan Wangji’s flinched.

And Jin Ling couldn’t help but gape.

“You two…” he began, cutting himself off as he struggled to comprehend. “You and Hanguang-jun are-”

Lan Sizhui’s narration began once more, the words familiar to Jin Ling. He recalled laughing with the others as they recorded these lines, adding their own comments or interpretations in according to their whims.

And yet, as he heard them now, the young sect leader couldn’t keep a shiver from running down his spine.

“Right now, Xian-gege had already lost his judgement,” Lan Sizhui recited calmly. “He was half-mad, half-delirious. His mind magnified all ill will people had toward him until he was absolutely certain that everyone in the world loathed him. He, too, loathed everyone in turn.”

Wei Wuxian’s eyes burned red.

“It didn’t matter who came at him. He wasn’t afraid. It was all the same. Everyone was the same.”

Everyone.

Including Jiang Cheng, Wei Wuxian’s former shidi.

Including Lan Wangji, Wei Wuxian’s future husband.

Including-

“A-Xian!”

Despite the shouts all around, that one voice rang out.

“It’s time, A-Ling,” Wei Wuxian said. Jin Ling felt his heart rate speed up. And yet, at that moment, his eyes did not go to where his mother was. Instead, he found himself directing them at his uncle.

The past’s Jiang Cheng had gone white as a ghost.

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli called out again.

‘That’s… A-Niang’s voice,’ Jin Ling thought, finally registering the full impact of the sound.

(How many times had he imagined meeting his mother? How many times had he wanted to hear her voice?)

(How many of those times did he imagine Wei Wuxian’s name would be the first thing he heard her say?)

Jin Ling swallowed, a feeling of disgust coming over him.

(He had imagined his mother saying Wei Wuxian’s name many times. Curses, rebukes, cries — assertions that she was wrong to trust him and that she would never make that mistake again. Never like this, though.)

“A-Xian!”

Concern, worry, and fear. Not because of him, but for him.

‘Jiang Yanli always did trust Wei Wuxian too much.’

Those words, or something to that effect, had been muttered countless times. Poor Jin Zixuan — everyone knew he didn’t deserve to die. Jiang Yanli, however….

‘Well, that’s what she gets for trusting a dog like Wei Wuxian.’

No one would dare say as much to Jin Ling’s face, but the consensus was clear.

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli called out again.

That wasn't just trust. The sheer desperation in her voice alluded to much more than that. But-

"A-Li…" Madam Yu trailed off. "What… are you doing here?"

"Shijie?" the memories' Wei Wuxian asked.

The future's Wei Wuxian flinched at the sounds. The horror on his face was almost identical to what had appeared on most of the watchers. No one, at any point in time, wanted Jiang Yanli to be there.

'Deserved it?' Wei Wuxian repeated, snapping out of his thoughts. 'What? No, no — a-Ling, no! They didn't deserve it at all! Your parents were trying to help. Both of them were. It's just that… I-'

Wei Wuxian had been attacked on all sides and had made a mistake.

Jin Ling's parents hadn't deserved what happened to them.

It was all just-

"Shijie!" the memories' Wei Wuxian shouted.

Jin Ling jerked up.

Wei Wuxian was in the center of the battlefield, now. People were attacking him on all sides, too fast for Jin Ling to follow. In the dark of night, it was nearly impossible to tell who anyone was. Arrows, talismans, and cultivation swords kept coming his way, but Wei Wuxian pushed through.

"Shijie?! Where are you? I can't see you!"

The watchers from the past began arguing with each other, all shouting over one another.

Both Wei Wuxian and Jin Ling kept their eyes firmly on Jiang Yanli instead.

Wei Wuxian ducked, dodging a sword. His right hand snapped out to catch an arrow that had gotten through the resentment surrounding him. He shoved an attacking cultivator to the side, not having time to deal with them fully. Instead, he continued to press forward.

At that moment, a headless corpse stood up behind Jiang Yanli.

Jin Ling had gone on night hunts with Wei Wuxian dozens to hundreds of times since the other came back to life. Demonic cultivation wasn't usually necessary, but Wei Wuxian's comfort with the techniques (and still-forming core) meant Jin Ling had long since grown familiar with the art. Never once, in all that time, had Wei Wuxian ever lost control of a corpse.

The decaying corpse raised a rusty sword.

The watchers all flinched or winced as though Wei Wuxian’s words were physically assaulting their minds. The intensity of the demonic cultivation rose, brushing against Jin Ling’s skin like sandpaper.

(He was still not as sensitive to the resentment’s influence as the watchers were. The command was too powerful to ignore, however. Jin Ling’s desire to flee multiplied tenfold.)

The boy swallowed, calling out, “Wei Wuxian?”

“Stop!” the memories continued. “Stop it, stop it, right now — stop it!”

The corpse didn’t respond.

Neither did the real Wei Wuxian.

“Wei Wuxian?” Jin Ling tried again.

But the Yiling Patriarch was just gazing blankly at the air before him, unable to respond.

“A-Xian?” the real Jiang Yanli asked.

“Wei Wuxian, why can’t you-!”

Jin Ling’s question was never finished. For, at that moment, the corpse struck down. Jiang Yanli screamed. The shouts of the watchers filled Jin Ling’s ears.

A twenty-two-year-old Jiang Wanyin, formed from the memories, ran towards Wei Wuxian. He threw a punch, sending the Yiling Patriarch stumbling back.

“What happened?!” he demanded. “Didn’t you say you could control it?! Didn’t you say it’d be fine?!”

The intensity of the rage Jin Ling saw there was familiar. He wondered, now, if an image of that corpse attacking Jiang Yanli formed in Jiang Wanyin’s mind every time he caught a suspected Wei Wuxian.

And, in response, Wei Wuxian had no excuse he could give:

“I… don’t know either,” he said. “I can’t control it. I just can’t control it.”

An unsatisfying explanation.

It was the truth, nonetheless.

Jin Ling had never once seen Wei Wuxian lose control. He had never seen Wei Wuxian trapped like this either.

Suddenly, Jiang Yanli twitched.

“A-Jie?”

“A-Niang?!” Jin Ling asked, kneeling down beside her.

(Wei Wuxian had told him he hurt Jiang Yanli. They were here to watch her death. That didn’t make the sight any easier.)

(Jin Ling felt like he was going to throw up.)

To Jin Ling’s side, the living Jin Zixuan was also kneeling. He shook, tears forming in his eyes.

“A-Li!” he cried out. “I’m sorry! I’m sorry-”

The sight of a living Jin Zixuan kneeling by Jiang Yanli’s side was too much for Wei Wuxian. He stumbled back, his hands starting to shake. Jin Zixuan’s apologies — too vague for Wei Wuxian to determine their cause — only made the shaking worse.

“A-Xian.”

Jiang Yanli’s voice, soft and weakened, cut through the conflict.

“Shijie, I… I’m here,” Wei Wuxian assured.

Wei Wuxian could taste bile in his mouth. The red bleeding through Jiang Yanli’s white robes was impossibly vibrant. The pain the injury must have been causing her was unquestionable, yet none of that showed on her face.

Wei Wuxian took a deep breath.

(The last time he had entered the Píngxíng Gateway, the sight of the Burial Mounds had been enough to send him into a panic. Jin Ling had asked to see the entirety of this. He couldn’t afford to lose control now.)

Then, too quietly for Wei Wuxian to hear, the past’s Jin Zixuan whispered something out loud.

“It wasn’t his fault, A-Li,” he assured. “I’m sorry. I invited him but… I didn’t see what was going on until it was too late.”

Jin Ling, kneeling next to his father, turned to look at him with wide eyes.

Then, at last, Jiang Yanli spoke:

“A-Xian…. Back then… why did you run away so fast? I didn’t get the chance to look at you… or say anything to you.”

The memories of Jiang Yanli did not look at Wei Wuxian with hate. The real Jin Zixuan didn't either. The real Jiang Yanli had tears in her eyes, but the reason for her cries was impossible to determine.

Jin Ling's 'Uncle Jiang,' on the other hand…

The real version of Jiang Cheng — the fifteen-year-old version of Jin Ling's own uncle — was staring, wide-eyed, at the scene before them. The memories had shown the corpse's attack quite clearly. As blood pooled around the illusion of Jiang Yanli, terror was clear in Jiang Wanyin's face. The memory version of him made an expression almost identical to the real one's.

'...So that's it,' Jin Ling thought. 'Wei Wuxian was telling the truth: he lost control and now Uncle Jiang hates him. Like Wei Wuxian said, he genuinely messed up by doing that.'

Just an accident. But-

"You killed A-Jie," the real Jiang Cheng gasped out.

Wei Wuxian flinched, feeling the words as a physical blow.

Jiang Cheng's hate, in this moment, made perfect sense.

'But….' Jin Ling furrowed his brows. 'Didn't Wei Wuxian say that… something else killed mom?'

That was hard to believe, considering what was being shown. Jiang Yanli coughed, blood falling from her mouth.

"I'm…." She breathed heavily. "I'm here to tell you…"

Jiang Yanli coughed again, more blood falling out.

The red overwhelmed Wei Wuxian's gaze. His own heart rate picked up, his breaths coming out faster and faster-

"Wei Wuxian!"

The Yiling Patriarch flinched, turning to Jin Ling. The boy's legs shook a little as though he was carrying a heavy weight on his back. His brows were furrowed with strain.

"Your eyes…" he said. "They're red."

Wei Wuxian blinked, confused.

"It's… heavy," Jin Ling gasped, resentment pouring down on him.

Because Wei Wuxian had lost control.

Again.

The resentment vanished at once, pulled back according to the will of its master. Said master stepped back, pale as a ghost from horror at himself. He couldn't even verbalize an apology right now. Shakily, he sat down.

He had promised to show this to Jin Ling. He could last for a little while longer.

~~Even if Jin Ling came to hate him after this, he would see it through.~~

However, at that moment:

"The Jin Sect's doctors are reasonably skilled," someone declared.

Jin Ling looked over, not recognizing the speaker at first. The woman was dressed in the robes of the Wen Sect, her eyes the same shade of gray as Wen Ning's.

"Oh." Jin Ling realized at once.

(It was the woman whose ashes had been scattered just a month after he'd been born.)

(The famed doctor of the Wen.)

"She still has some time left," the doctor continued, looking Jiang Yanli over. "If… if she gets to them before an hour passes…"

But the battle within the memories was continuing without rest.

"Shijie," the Wei Wuxian-from-memories spoke. "Stop… stop talking. I'll get you out of here right away."

Both versions of Jiang Cheng tensed at that, glaring up at Wei Wuxian with untrusting eyes.

Luckily, in that moment, Wei Wuxian didn't try to approach.

'What does she want to say?' the Wei Wuxian of the past wondered. 'That it's fine? That she doesn't hate me? That everything's okay? That she doesn't blame me for having killed Jin Zixuan?'

Wei Wuian nearly laughed.

'Impossible.'

Guilt. Sorrow.

Their faces were different, so this version of Wei Wuxian was a little hard for Jin Ling to superimpose onto the version he knew. It was easy, from a distance, to imagine this was someone else entirely.

The expression that Wei Wuxian was making now was one very familiar to Jin Ling, however.

(It was identical to the one showing up on the real Wei Wuxian right now.)

Whatever had happened to Jin Ling's parents, Wei Wuxian had not wanted it. Jin Ling's mother and father didn't deserve to die.

"A-Xian," Jiang Yanli managed, still using that nickname despite everything that had happened. "You should… you should stop first. Stop. Stop them."

"I'll stop!" Wei Wuxian promised. "Yes, I'll stop!"

A few flute notes were played. Gradually, the army's movement came to a halt.

The undead army, that is. The cultivators were left unaffected by the sound.

Jin Ling straightened up. He had heard stories of this battle countless times, spoken by drunkards and warriors alike. Not a single one of them had ever mentioned Wei Wuxian stopping at his mother's command.

'Does A-Niang… want him to surrender?' Jin Ling thought. 'Okay, so she doesn't disagree with what the army is doing. She just also… doesn't hate Wei Wuxian?'

Yet Jin Ling's uncle, regardless of which version one looked at, was far less forgiving. Hurt, fear, anger, and frustration were all apparent on Jiang Cheng's face. The two versions looked down at Jiang Yanli, emotions building up within them.

For all that Jiang Cheng had told Jin Ling about demonic cultivators, he had never mentioned this day in detail. Jin Ling's mother had died in Jiang Cheng's arms. Something like that would be impossible to forget.

With conflicted eyes, both Jiang Chengs watched Wei Wuxian kneel by Jiang Yanli's side. His hands became stained with her blood. Neither Wei Wuxian nor Jiang Yanli looked angry at this moment. Sect Leader Jiang's rage made up for their comparative lack.

Jiang Yanli was dying in Jiang Wanyin's arms.

The real Jiang Cheng couldn't stand it.

"But he still killed-"

Jiang Cheng's sentence never finished. A series of events occurred too quickly for Jin Ling to react to. There was a flash of silver. Wei Wuxian fell back, pushed by someone. More red sprayed into the air.

A sword was sticking out of Jiang Yanli's throat.

Jin Ling screamed, jumping back. Despite his experience with night hunts, he had never seen such a brutal attack occur so suddenly. He nearly gagged, the sight of the blade in his mother's neck almost too much for him to bear.

“A-Li?” Madam Yu asked.

Jiang Yanli’s head went lopsided. The attacker, a man Jin Ling had never met before, finally seemed to realize his attack had hit someone else. He backed up, throwing out excuses.

“She just threw herself over on her own-”

Wei Wuxian killed the man, not letting him finish.

For a moment, there was a pause. A fresh corpse was on the ground. Jiang Yanli’s corpse was in Jiang Cheng’s arms. Neither could move.

‘What just… that happened so fast I couldn’t-’ Jin Ling gaped.

Jiang Wanyin looked shocked and confused, not even seeming to register what was before his eyes. The same was true of Wei Wuxian.

‘It was all… a blur,’ Wei Wuxian confessed, explaining to Jin Ling. ‘I don’t really remember anything that happened after your mom died. Up through my death it’s all just…’

Both versions of Wei Wuxian looked dazed.

No one was thinking clearly.

Jin Ling had been made to hate Wei Wuxian based on stories of this night. Countless people had rallied behind that cause.

Sect Leader Yao cursed at Wei Wuxian, shouting, “Instead of learning, you took another life. Wei Wuxian, your crimes will never be forgiven!”

Wei Wuxian had killed the person who killed Jin Ling’s mother.

Funny, how Sect Leader Yao had never mentioned that.

Was Wei Wuxian involved in this tragedy? Yes.

Had he injured Jiang Yanli? Apparently.

Was it his fault?

Jiang Wanyin seemed to think so. But-

“You shut up!” the real Jiang Cheng screamed. His shout, at this moment, was directed at Sect Leader Yao.

Jin Ling looked up.

The real Jiang Cheng had changed position. He had been standing on the sidelines a little while ago. Now, however, he had moved between the memory forms of Wei Wuxian and Sect Leader Yao.

Protecting Wei Wuxian.

This version of Jin Ling's uncle, who had seen everything leading up to this point, wanted to protect Wei Wuxian.

Behind him, the memory version of Wei Wuxian seemed to snap. Demonic energy surged from him, painting the world black. He pulled the Stygian Tiger Seal from his robes, assembling it and calling forth its power.

The world went black.

Jin Ling blinked, opening his eyes. When he inhaled, he felt real air enter his lungs. He looked over.

Wei Wuxian — the real Wei Wuxian, with the face of Jin Ling's cousin — sat to the side. He said nothing for a while, his gaze hanging low. His silver eyes, usually shimmering with light, looked dull and faded.

"...Wei Wuxian?" Jin Ling called out.

Those eyes glanced toward him. Jin Ling swallowed once.

"Are…" he trailed off. "Are you okay?"

After pausing for a while longer, Wei Wuxian nodded once. He stood up, did a casual stretch of his arms, then looked back at Jin Ling with a warm smile.

"Looks like that was the end of that segment," he observed. "Did you want to see more? Or does that satisfy your curiosity?"

Jin Ling paused, then nodded his head.

"I'm… okay, now," he said. "I get what you meant. About it being a confusing time and things."

When Wei Wuxian had first explained the night to him, the accidental nature of what happened had seemed hard to believe. It felt cheap and false — a non-answer given to keep Jin Ling from finding out anything of substance. However, after seeing it himself…

What other way was there to describe that?

That had been the largest army Jin Ling had ever seen. Even the sect's alliance during his lifetime paled in comparison.

(Wei Wuxian had killed enough of them to make a visible difference in size.)

Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation, let loose under ideal conditions, was far stronger than Jin Ling had realized. He understood, now, how so many fantastical stories could be attributed to the Yiling Patriarch.

And now?

Jin Ling sat up fully.

Sect Leader Yao had seen how Jiang Yanli died. Sect Leader Yao had never told Jin Ling the truth.

Jiang Wanyin had seen how Jiang Yanli died. Jin Ling's uncle had always kept details from him.

The past's Jiang Wanyin had seen everything leading up to that. The past's Jiang Wanyin had moved in front of Wei Wuxian protectively. Accident or not, it could be argued that Wei Wuxian's actions caused Jiang Yanli's death. The fact that the youngest Jiang Cheng hadn't directed anger at him…

Jin Ling breathed in.

"Wei Wuxian," he called out. "When… when the past sect leaders are out of the simulation… I want to speak to my uncle."

"The younger Jiang Cheng?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Jin Ling nodded once.

"...Alright," Wei Wuxian agreed. "I'll try to arrange that."

Jin Ling nodded once more. He blinked twice.

~~Every time he did, an image flashed in his mind. Jiang Yanli, lying dead, a sword spearing through her neck. Nausea welled up in Jin Lings stomach and he swallowed, feeling like he was about to throw up.~~

He blinked again.

~~Jiang Yanli's neck had been cut wide open, the gaping wound gushing with blood as her head rolled back onto Jiang Cheng's lap.~~

Jin Ling swallowed.

~~Wei Wuxian had wanted to keep him from the memories for exactly this reason.~~

But…

"Thank you," Jin Ling said. "Thank you."

Wei Wuxian paused, tensing in apprehension, then reached forward to pat Jin Ling's head.

"...You're welcome," he said. "We… have a spare bed I can set up. Why don't you spend the night? If you have any trouble sleeping you can come to me, alright?"

It was an embarrassing request. Jin Ling was almost sixteen now. He was far from a child. At his age, Wei Wuxian had fought the Xuanwu of Slaughter! He could return to Lanling and sleep by himself just fine.

Jin Ling blinked.

~~Jiang Yanli's mouth had been slightly open. A pool of blood had formed there. Jin Ling's uncle had felt her body grow cold. Her blood had poured onto his legs.~~

~~The sword had cut right through bone. Her head had fallen back at an angle no living human could ever attempt.~~

"A-Ling?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"I'd… like that," he accepted, ducking his head.

Wei Wuxian got to work at once, moving around with a spring in his step. Another bedspread was laid out on the floor. Next to it, Wei Wuxian placed a dim lamp with enough fuel to last until morning. He laid on his side, counting the number of blankets he'd put in.

~~Jiang Yanli had ended up in a similar position. The main difference between the two sights was the lack of a sword sticking out of Wei Wuxian's throat.~~

~~Jin Ling had stabbed him in the stomach once. The smell of blood that had covered his hands at the time was still a vivid memory to him.~~

"Hm! Nice and soft!" Wei Wuxian confirmed, pressing down a few times. "This might surprise you, but the Lan Sect has some of the nicest blankets I've ever seen. I'm sure even Young Master Jin will be comfortable tonight."

Jin Ling nodded, trying desperately to not blink, and laid himself down on the fabric.

"Will you want anything else?" Wei Wuxian checked.

Jin Ling opened his mouth, momentarily wanting to ask Wei Wuxian to stay, then closed it a moment later and shook his head. Wei Wuxian paused for a bit, watching him thoughtfully, then nodded in agreement and got up.

(Jin Ling hadn't seen the real Wei Wuxian's face the moment the memories' Jiang Yanli died. He had glanced over a moment later, then did a double take, unable to find him. Eventually, he had noticed Wei Wuxian in the far end of the field. The man had sat back, brought his knees up, and buried his head in them, unwilling to see even a bit of it. His hands had been covering his ears, but that wouldn't keep the surrounding screams from being heard. Resentful energy had swirled around him in a tightly wound mess, moving less than a centimeter away from his skin. Thanks to that, Jin Ling had been able to watch that segment in full.)

(Right now, the serene smile on Wei Wuxian's face was more than he could bear.)

A hand fell on Jin Ling's head. He tensed, looking up, and felt Wei Wuxian give his head a soothing scratch. The light brush of his hand was warm with life. Jin Ling breathed out, settling into the fabric around him.

(The Yiling Patriarch's glowing red eyes had startled Jin Ling the first time he saw them. Those same eyes had widened in shock when a corpse approached Jiang Yanli. When she was hit, the Yiling Patriarch had shouted in fear. When she pushed him out of the way to take a killing blow, Wei Wuxian had screamed in despair.)

Wei Wuxian's hand continued to brush through Jin Ling's hair. The ribbon he had been using to pull it back was now set to the side. With Wei Wuxian's free hand he sent forth some wind, causing the light from the lamp to dim.

(Wei Wuxian hadn't killed Jiang Yanli; Jiang Yanli had given her life to save him. In exchange, Wei Wuxian had saved Jin Ling a dozen times over. If he was here, things were safe.)

Jin Ling closed his eyes. Exhaustion from stress and emotional distress sapped away his energy. Soon, his breathing became even and slow. Wei Wuxian pulled his hand away, standing up. For a few seconds, he continued to stare at Jin Ling.

'I wasn't sure if touching him would just make him more stressed,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'After what he just saw, I wouldn't be surprised.'

The corpse that hit Jiang Yanli had been controlled by Wei Wuxian. Jin Ling could have recoiled away in fear and disgust and no one would blame him.

Instead, he had relaxed.

Wei Wuxian began to walk, quietly returning to the room he shared with Lan Wangji. He slipped off his temporary outer robe, using the moonlight to guide his path. When he returned to the bed, Lan Wangji shifted, cracking his eyes open.

"Wei Ying?" he asked.

"Shh. Go back to sleep," Wei Wuxian requested. "A-Ling's sleeping in the other room."

As he slipped under the blankets, a hand reached out and covered his own. It pulled with immense strength, dragging Wei Wuxian down. As soon as he was lying on the bed, Lan Wangji's other arm reached out to wrap around him. He pulled Wei Wuxian against his chest.

"You're so cuddly," Wei Wuxian laughed. "It's hours past bedtime for Little Lans. Shouldn't you be trying to sleep?"

"I am," Lan Wangji confirmed. "We'll sleep like this."

"Will we?" Wei Wuxian asked, nuzzling in closer. "Are you sure you don't have any other intentions, pulling me in here?"

"Ridiculous."

Wei Wuxian laughed at that as well, agreeing fully. After a few moments longer, he finally began to close his eyes. Neither he nor Jin Ling were done talking about what happened. It was late now, however. As a Lan-by-marriage, it was arguably long past time for Wei Wuxian to sleep, too.

They would talk tomorrow. They would have to talk tomorrow, but-

Wei Wuxian shut his eyes fully. It didn't take long for sleep to claim him.

Nie Huaisang was about 80% sure that they were all going crazy. For one, none of the watchers had slept in the past month and a half — all the while taking in more information than they ever had before. The other watchers were pretty sure the magic of the simulation made it so they didn't need sleep, but crazy people should never be the judges of what's acceptable. Besides, even putting the sleep matter aside…

There was a haunted look in Jiang Cheng's eyes. His gaze was directed at the ground, unseeing yet alert all at once. There was no doubt in Nie Huaisang's mind that everything they had learned over the past few days was replaying in the Jiang heir's head without end. Not even his sister would be able to snap him out of his thoughts now.

Irrelevant; she wasn't exactly in the mood to try. A lost look had appeared on Jiang Yanli. Every now and then she would bring her hand up to her neck, hovering just over where that careless sword had speared through her other-self. She would mutter things every once in a while, speaking to the effect of 'how could you?' and 'what about A-Xian' and 'how could you think running into a battlefield would go well?'

~~She and Jin Zixuan were truly meant for each other, weren't they?~~

Jin Zixuan and Madam Jin seemed unable to decide whether to look at the in-between zone's roof, the floor, or at Jiang Yanli's all-too-quiet form. No, perhaps that wasn't a fair description. No one felt like talking right now.

As for Madam Yu…

"Stupid idiot!" she cursed, rubbing her temples with her right hand. "How could you — of all the things…"

Her foot tapped impatiently against the floor, tension and pressure boiling over within her.

"You should've — it all just — if it wasn't so fast, I-"

She cut off, growing frustrated enough to nearly pull out her own hair. Nie Huaisang wasn't sure who, exactly, she meant when she said 'you.' He wasn't even sure she knew.

'You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look at what our sect has turned into because of you!'

'You call that being allies? The Jiang raised him like their own, but almost all of them were killed because of him!'

It wasn't confirmed that Madam Yu's final words caused that rumor to be spread around. They hadn't seen it happen directly. Nevertheless, the thought was there. And-

THWACK

Wei Wuxian stopped. He looked down.

An arrow was sticking out of his chest.

'I got him!' a young archer cried out, proud and exhilarated and not exhibiting even the slightest trace of remorse.

(That archer's younger brother was the person who would kill Jiang Yanli.)

(Was it unreasonable to assume the person Madam Yu was speaking to right now was herself?)

"Stupid," Madam Yu hissed again. "Stupid, stupid, stupid-"

Click

Everyone froze. Wei Wuxian had spoken to them just a few minutes ago. For him to return so soon might mean something had happened.

(And, more than anything else, it felt like a second slap in the face after what they had just seen.)

However:

"San-niang?" Jiang Fengmian asked. "A-Li? A-Cheng?"

"...A-Die?" Jiang Cheng asked back.

Jiang Fengmian seemed to breathe out a sigh of relief at his son's voice. He then cleared his throat.

"Are you all okay?" he asked.

There was a pause.

For several seconds, it stretched on.

"...We're fine, Fengmian," Madam Yu declared. "Is something wrong?"

"Not… in particular," the Sect Leader confessed. "A-Xian mentioned that you all seemed a little upset about something. I thought I… should check in. Are you sure you're all feeling alright?"

The ensuing silence was answer enough.

“Did… something like the Burial Mounds happen again?” Jiang Fengmian inquired. “I’m the only one in this building right now. No one will overhear.”

Because Jiang Fengmian had been on the other side of things just a few days ago. He had been quiet and subdued, unwilling to face Wei Wuxian’s positivity after the massacre of Lotus Pier and the boy’s descent into the Burial Mounds.

(His own involvement in what occurred weighed on his mind to this day.)

‘But even that…’ Lan Xichen thought, ‘Isn’t on the same level as assembling an army against Wei Wuxian and the refugees he chose to protect.’

Jiang Fengmian’s lack of aggression had resulted in him not stopping Madam Yu and Wen Ruohan. Lan Xichen’s lack of confrontation had brought the Lan Sect onto the wrong side of a war. Understanding one did not mean understanding the other. The first jade pursed his lips together, unable to speak.

“We’re fine,” Wen Ruohan answered at last, seeing that no one else was going to. “We witnessed your daughter’s death today.”

Jiang Fengmian sucked a breath of air, caught off guard. They heard him swallow then clear his throat.

“I… I see,” he said.

They’d all known it was coming. This wasn’t something that could truly be prepared for, however.

“What… happened?” Jiang Fengmian asked. “Was… was A-Xian in-”

“Following Jin Zixuan’s death, the Four Great Sects of the Sunshot Campaign offered A-Ying peace in exchange for Wen Qing and Wen Ning,” Wen Ruohan interrupted, not interested in prolonging the discussion. “The exchange was made. When A-Ying went to collect their bodies, he realized the sects had gone back on their offer and were already planning an invasion.”

The other watchers flinched at his words, hating to hear them directly but unable to object. No one could offer so much as a protest — not now, at least. Jin Guangshan, the only one who emotionally could have, was not interested in angering Wen Qing or Wen Ruohan at this time.

“A fight began,” the Chief Cultivator continued. “Your daughter ran out to tell A-Ying something. He injured her by accident, overwhelmed and losing control.”

Jiang Fengmian sucked in a breath of air.

“A-Ying ran over to her side. While he was distracted, a member of the united sects approached from behind, preparing to strike. Your daughter pushed him out of the way.”

“...What?” Jiang Fengmian asked. “Wait, you mean-”

Jiang Cheng laughed, sounding hopeless and mocking and yet relieved all at once. The sound made Jiang Fengmian pause, torn between tentative hope and fear.

Sensing the man's hesitancy (and Wen Ruohan's willingness to let the Sect Leader stew), Lan Wangji spoke up to confirm: "Maiden Jiang gave her life to save Wei Ying's. Neither ever wanted the other to die."

Something Jin Ling couldn't know.

Jiang Yanli asking Wei Wuxian to stop fighting had also been lost to time. His compliance with her request was something no one from this battle would believe. It was no wonder Jin Ling had stabbed Wei Wuxian.

(The terrible future they had once doubted seemed so inevitable, now.)

"...Ah," Jiang Fengmian muttered back. It was hard to specify how he felt at the moment.

(His daughter was dead. Even knowing that it would happen couldn't take the pain of the idea away. His daughter was fine in this timeline, but the potential was still there.)

It wasn't Wei Wuxian's fault. Jiang Fengmian's trust wasn't misplaced.

Though, while no one had wanted Jiang Yanli dead, it seemed like everyone had been trying to kill Wei Wuxian.

(Was that really a surprise? He had seen the way his ward was described in the far-future timeline. Most of those people would say referring to him as a demon was far too kind.)

No, more importantly than that-

"Are you… okay, A-Li?"

"Eh?" Jiang Yanli asked.

"I'm… sorry you had to watch that," Jiang Fengmian continued. "Are you alright? Is there anything I can do to help you?"

"Ah… yes. I'm fine," the young maiden confirmed, responding automatically and without thought. It wasn't the truth or a lie; she simply lacked the mental strength to consider that question right now. She was neither happy nor devastated. At the moment, all she could be was 'fine.'

"Jin-gongzi… has passed as well?" Jiang Fengmian inquired. "You said A-Xian was involved?"

"Don't — don't worry about that," Jin Zixuan cut in. "It wasn't his fault."

It was a stronger statement than most would have made. Nonetheless, no one disagreed.

“A-Li, A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian called again. “You two-”

“They’re fine, Fengmian!” Madam Yu snapped. Everyone paused, turning her way.

Even Jiang Fengmian seemed taken aback, hesitating before he said, “My Lady, I was only-”

“I’m with them, aren’t I?” she shouted, her voice burning with venom. “You didn’t see any of what happened — you’re not even able to see us now! How exactly do you think you’ll be able to help?!”

Her anger was spilling out wildly, falling on Jiang Fengmian as it usually did. Madam Jin inhaled heavily but said nothing to stop it. As such, Madam Yu continued on:

“Ha. Though, of course, that wouldn’t matter to you. You left to look after Wei Wuxian just like always!”

Jiang Cheng flinched at her words, the protest he had been about to give dying before it began. Jiang Yanli kept her gaze to the ground, too tired to listen anymore.

“Sanniang, you know that’s not what it is!” Jiang Fengmian protested. “If I hadn’t left-”

“If you hadn’t left, someone else would have! They would have looked over the boy just as well as you. All anyone here cares about is the crimes committed against Wei Wuxian anyway!”

A short, amused laugh escaped from Wen Ruohan.

Lan Qiren took in a calming breath. It was true: Jiang Yanli’s death had just been shown, and yet almost none of their discussion since the segment had been about that. Questions on how to avoid it inevitably became ‘how do we keep Wei Wuxian from being in that situation.’ That was only to be expected; when the incident was an accident on all sides, what else could one do? Still, Madam Yu’s anger at their disregard was understandable. Nonetheless…

“A-Niang,” Jiang Yanli called out. “Please stop.”

Her voice was calm and steady. She had experienced a torrent of emotion over the past hour or so. Now, exhaustion seemed to be all that was left. The words made Madam Yu’s anger fluctuate for a moment, a thousand emotions flashing through her eyes, before that same anger returned.

“Of course. My mistake.” She laughed. “How dare I speak against Wei Wuxian in this household? How dare I blame him for anything?! I should have known-”

“San-niang, it-”

“Shut your mouth, Jiang Fengmian! You think I don’t know what I’ve done?!” she asked, then, spinning on her heel, cast her gaze over the other watchers. “Do you all think I don’t know? Do you think I can’t see what’s right in front of me?!”

No one spoke.

“You think I don’t know how you all look at me?! I’m not even alive at this point in the simulation, but you all still blame me for what’s happening, don’t you?!”

‘You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!'

Jin Guangshan turned an understanding gaze on Jiang Cheng, adding, ‘He’s been plotting to go to the Burial Mounds for a while, hasn’t he? With his skills, it would be child’s play to set up a sect of his own.”

It had taken almost nothing for her son to believe that snake.

He already believed her. Why would Jin Guangshan’s words sound strange?

“A-Niang,” Jiang Yanli said again. “I know you don’t mean that. Please stop.”

For years, Jiang Yanli had been the Jiang Clan’s intermediary, serving as a soothing force whenever arguments occurred. However, even in all that time, she had never spoken to her mother in quite this manner.

“He hurt you, A-Li.”

“I know.”

“He might have killed you! We don’t know that doctors could have saved you. That’s all just speculation!”

“I know.”

“You…” Madam Yu choked, her anger and grief spilling out. “You’ve always been far too forgiving. All of you have! No matter what Wei Wuxian takes from the Jiang, you always just accept it.”

First, Jiang Cheng’s dogs.

Now, Jiang Yanli’s life.

Distantly, Jiang Cheng recalled the anger he had felt at losing his pets all those years ago. They were living creatures, not possessions. It had hurt to lose them. While it didn’t affect him much anymore, in the moment it had felt crushing. They hadn’t been killed, just taken away. His sister’s death hurt far more.

A sister’s death was an incomparable kind of pain.

“...Wen Qing was burned alive,” Jiang Cheng suddenly said. “By the great sects. I think we forgot to mention that earlier.”

An image of Wen Qing, tied to a post for execution, suddenly flashed through Jiang Cheng's mind.

Many people looked over, momentarily perplexed by the sudden change in topic. Even Wen Qing herself looked confused by the mention. This had nothing to do with Wei Wuxian nearly killing Jiang Yanli.

(Except it had everything to do with that.)

Jiang Cheng would freely admit that empathy had never been his strong suit. A few weeks ago he would never have conceded to that, but, after witnessing his future-self, it was impossible to ignore.

Just like Jiang Yanli, Wen Qing had never hurt anyone.

Just like Jiang Yanli, Wen Qing had saved Wei Wuxian's life.

(And Jiang Cheng's, too.)

She stood across the room from him, directly in his line of sight. Her death, both within the simulation and among them, had barely been commented on. It was unimportant, relatively speaking.

~~Had Wei Wuxian viewed her as his sister too? Had he lost two older sisters that day? Had the future's Jiang Cheng mentioned to anyone what Wen Qing had done for him?~~

~~No, probably not.~~

"I… see," Jiang Fengmian recovered. "Would you like me to get your brother for you, Qing-guniang?"

"No, it's alright," the doctor assured. "Thank you for the offer."

And that was that.

Madam Yu stood silently now, the topic change throwing off her anger too. Her gaze, slowly, fell upon Wen Qing. The proud woman was standing as well, both their chairs destroyed when the energy of the Stygian Tiger Seal activated in the last segment.

"Should we move the pieces of destroyed chairs to the side?" Nie Huaisang suddenly suggested. "Wouldn't want anyone to get a splinter."

"A splinter?" Nie Mingjue repeated with a laugh. It wasn't a happy sound.

A splinter.

Right now, that was the concern.

A silver blade pierced through Jiang Yanli's neck.

Ridiculous.

And yet, Nie Huaisang's suggestion seemed to be all it took to make the room unfreeze. The Lans moved first, using the ends of their long robes to sweep bits of wood to the side. Wen Ruohan's chair, farther back than some of the others, was still mostly intact. Nonetheless, the man used a blast of energy to send the seat to the edge of the in-between zone, not wanting to sit on something cracked. Jin Zixuan took the pieces of his and his mother's chairs, sitting on the ground beside her shortly after.

Jiang Fengmian, despite not having the context for this flurry of motion, said nothing. He waited until the shuffling sounds stopped, assuming people had found their places again.

"We're almost out of time," he revealed, voice soft. "San-niang, I…"

Madam Yu exhaled softly.

"Don't, Fengmian," she requested. "I know."

She wondered what sort of expression she would make if she could see Wei Wuxian in front of her now.

She wondered if she'd even be able to look at him.

"San-niang…" Jiang Fengmian began again, but seemed to give up a moment later. "Right. I understand. Once A-Xian gets back we'll… get in contact again."

He swallowed once.

"A-Li, A-Cheng… I love you very much. I'm… proud of you, for making it through that."

His children's eyes widened in surprise. They looked up in the direction of their father's voice, trembling slightly. Then, before they could respond, there was a click marking the end of the connection.

Click.

Jin Guangshan tensed slightly.

Red.

Lan Qiren jumped.

Vibrant enough to blot out everything else in sight, dark enough to send a chill up the watchers' spines; the once-white mourning robes Jiang Yanli wore were now drenched in the color of war. As the simulation continued to move out, allowing the watchers to see more and more of the scene before them, that fact remained. Red fabric shifted around them, encompassing them like a cocoon. Jiang Yanli's ~~corpse~~ body was flat on the ground, crimson fabric draping over her and spreading out across the floor.

‘What is this?’ Wen Ruohan furrowed his brows as he scanned their surroundings. The mystifying imagery before them was difficult to understand. Jiang Yanli’s robes didn’t contain enough fabric to create this sight. Every drop of blood could have been squeezed from her body and there still wouldn’t have been enough to dye this much of the ground red.

“Shijie?!”

Wei Wuxian’s voice, though recognizable as his, was faded and distorted as though they were only hearing its echo. Wei Wuxian called out to Jiang Yanli again and again. The source of the voice — Wei Wuxian himself — was nowhere to be seen.

“Stop,” Jiang Yanli requested. “Stop them.”

The real Jiang Yanli flinched upon hearing her own voice, Wen Ruohan’s words coming back to her at once.

‘If Jiang Yanli hadn’t asked A-Ying to stop his corpses — to let the army attacking him go — she might have lived.’

Jiang Yanli glanced back at her mother. Madam Yu looked distraught — nearly pained. It was an expression Jiang Yanli had never seen on the prideful Yu Ziyuan before. She wondered if Madam Yu was recalling the same thing as her.

“A-Xian!”

“Wei Wuxian!”

SHING

A white blade pierced through the red. Its presence was all-encompassing, the white gleam enhanced by the surrounding red. The blade itself was impossibly large, looking as wide as a carriage and as long as a boat.

It had cut between Jiang Yanli and Jiang Cheng, obstructing their views of each other. Jin Zixuan had reacted at once, quickly moving to push Jiang Yanli back and stand between her and the blade. However, impossible to physically push, Jiang Yanli remained right where she was, staring up at the blade that had caused her doom.

(That had pierced through her neck. How much had it hurt?)

“A-Jie!” Jiang Cheng shouted, running around the blade to see her. It had implanted itself into the floor between them, preventing Jiang Cheng from seeing his sister until he came around. The sight stopped him in his tracks.

“A-Li?” Jin Zixuan ask. “A-Li, you’re not breathing!”

Jiang Yanli stared.

The watchers were not physically part of the simulation. The blade could not reflect her gaze. Nonetheless, its presence seemed to bear down upon her.

"You bastard! This is for my brother!"

The red around them splashed, flying into the air as though it had been disturbed from underneath.

"Huh?"

The voice of the boy in question — the confused, lost tone of the person who had skewered Jiang Yanli — rang out.

"You-! Back then, you caused the deaths of Jiang Fengmian and his wife!" Sect Leader Yao's disembodied voice accused. "Now you've caused the death of your Shijie!"

What they heard next was not another accusation or even a protest. No words were spoken anymore. The red in their surroundings turned even darker than before.

Wei Wuxian screamed.

SNAP

With a gasp, Wei Wuxian woke up.

The watchers jumped as well, unprepared for the sudden change. The few still possessing chairs knocked them over as they stood, their hands falling to their sides to grab onto the swords that had once been there.

(After the last segment, it was no surprise they were a little tense.)

The place they were now was no brighter than before. Dim moonlight was the only thing illuminating the area, not even candlelight around to provide aid. However, thanks to the previous scene, the watchers had mostly adjusted to dim light. Now, the gray, rocky cave they were inside of shone clear.

Wei Wuxian sat up.

"Is he… in a prison?" Madam Yu asked. Both Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan pursed their lips. They last time they had seen Wei Wuxian, he was being attacked on all sides by the 'righteous' sects. After Jiang Yanli's death, Wei Wuxian had brought the Stygian Tiger Seal out. Had he lost and been captured?

(Would those people really imprison Wei Wuxian? They had tried to kill him before he'd even attacked! Surely they would want him dead.)

And yet, as Jin Zixuan glanced back at his father, he couldn't help but feel some doubt sink in.

Wen Qing scoffed at Jin Guangshan, laughing: 'Yes, you only spoke about Wei Wuxian. Because my family didn't have any Stygian Tiger Seals for you to acquire."

However-

“Those are the scrolls he was working on,” Lan Wangji observed. Everyone’s eyes followed his gaze.

And, indeed, several scrolls sat to Wei Wuxian’s right. They were hastily marked and lacking in real structure, most of the thoughts added on spur-of-the-moment. The scrolls were the notes Wei Wuxian had made.

Brought to his cell?

No. Not with the prototypes there, too. Giving unknown tools to a prisoner would be the height of stupidity.

This was the Burial Mounds: Wei Wuxian’s home.

But…

“How… did he get here?” Lan Wangji asked.

Enemies all around. No allies left alive. People he needed to protect.

How exactly had Wei Wuxian gotten out of that?

“Maybe… maybe his corpses carried him out?”

“What are you talking about?!” Jiang Cheng snapped, nearly growling at the First Jade’s suggestion. “Last time we saw him, he was ordering his corpse army to attack everyone! You don’t think the Stygian Tiger Seal exists for retreating, do you? If he could use it to get out he should have done that sooner. If he had left, A-Jie would-”

The Jiang heir cut himself off, unable to finish that sentence. A truly sickened expression crossed his face.

“Sorry. I just meant…”

He paused again, looking down.

He had been rambling without thinking. After all, if Wei Wuxian had ‘just left’ from the beginning, then the sect’s armies would have arrived by nightfall of the next day. No one pointed that out, however. Even the most obtuse could tell it didn’t need to be said.

(Well, Wen Chao might have said it if he was there. Luckily, he had been sent off ages ago.)

Nonetheless, Lan Xichen did have to concede that their last memories didn’t line up with a retreat. If the simulation had jumped forward in time (as it often did) wouldn’t there at least be a hint of what had happened before?

“Maybe… it did occur.”

“What do you mean?”

The question was both harsh and fast, containing an edge of desperation Nie Mingjue had never heard from Wen Ruohan before. The Chief Cultivator's gaze was zeroed in on Nie Huaisang, waiting for him to continue. Sect Leader Nie moved between them at once.

"Ah, well…" Nie Huaisang stuttered, stumbling over his words as he took a step back. "I-I just mean… we saw Wei-xiong lose control and use the Stygian Tiger Seal, but we didn't have a chance to see anything after. The resentment became too intense. I know I fell unconscious as soon as he pulled the seal out, but… are you sure you didn't fall asleep too? Maybe the simulation showed us how Wei-xiong got out of there and we were all just… unconscious."

The watchers stared back, the implications settling in. They had been stuck in the simulation for several weeks so far. Not once in that time had they all collectively missed something before. Lan Wangji paled even further with concern.

"I don't… think… I fell asleep," Wen Ruohan mused aloud, rubbing at his temples again.

The Seal had formed.

It snapped together.

Wen Ruohan had seen some of the others fall unconscious before everything went black. He'd heard a few chairs break, too. He didn't think he'd fallen asleep.

"How would you know if we all did?" Nie Huaisang asked, cutting through the protests and suggestions being made by the other watchers. "There aren't any sundials in here. There isn't even a sun! No one's able to come in and check on us if we take too long. For all we know, there was a whole segment between now and what we last remember."

The protesters paused, not sure how to respond.

"Out of everyone here, I'm the most used to falling unconscious because of resentment," Nie Huaisang declared. "Most of you have felt hurt or weighed on or heavy before, but this was the first time we all got knocked out! Maybe. It happens fast! You're awake one moment and feel like you're waking up the next. You don't get a few seconds of feeling sleepy or anything — it all happens at once."

Several eyes turned to Jiang Yanli. As the other frequent-victim of the resentment, she nodded in agreement with Nie Huaisang's words.

Lan Qiren frowned, commenting, "It seems unlikely we would have skipped exactly one segment. We fell asleep in one and woke up in before another? The in-between period is much shorter than the time over which the simulation is playing."

"Don't forget who we are, either," Madam Yu insisted. "We're not all going to spend an hour knocked out after a bit of resentment from that brat! Or do you think we're that weak?!"

Jin Guangshan nodded, adding, "We all woke up at about the same time. If we did fall asleep, it probably wasn't for long."

(Unless, of course, there had been a continuous stream of resentment affecting them during the scenes they missed.)

"I-I don't know, I don't know, I don't know!" Nie Huaisang cried out. "It's just an idea I had. I don't know, maybe it did skip forward and we'll see how Wei-xiong got out later. I-I just think we shouldn't worry about all this right now and that we should focus on the simulation. That's all I'm saying!"

Genuine tears looked seconds away from falling out of his eyes. Nie Mingjue scowled at the other Sect Leaders, trying to shift to block them while not giving Wen Ruohan access either.

(The Chief Cultivator was still staring at Nie Mingjue's younger brother. A chill ran down Sect Leader Nie's back.)

And, all this while, Wei Wuxian had been sitting still. He was no longer lying down on the stone floor but he had not moved to stand yet either. He simply sat up, staring at the dark cave before him.

'It truly does look like a prison.'

Madam Yu's first, initial thought had proven accurate. No one in their right mind would see this as a home. What if the past Madam Yu, from half a year ago, were to find out that the future-Wei Wuxian was living in a place like this? Well, she would probably feel hope surface anew.

'So, he left the Jiang Sect for good then?'

By choice and yet not by choice — forced by circumstance and a world that turned their back on the Wen.

(On two specific Wen who had recovered Madam Yu's ashes and saved her son from a painful death.)

'Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground.'

Was it time for that?

Now?

Now, when Wei Wuxian might not even try to fight back?

'Maybe that's best for everyone,' Madam Yu thought, avoiding looking at Wei Wuxian's uniquely soulless eyes. 'We already know he's going to die. That's the first thing they told us. If he doesn't fight back, at least no one else will get caught up in it.'

Wei Wuxian gazed blankly, hopelessly, at the cave wall before him.

Wouldn't it be a mercy for him to die now? They had seen him wake up. He wasn't perfect — he wasn't unaffected — but he was better, at least. Maybe some time away from the world of the living would help him. Maybe, if ~~her son~~ the sects attacked now, it wouldn't be so bad. Maybe-

"Xian-gege?"

Madam Yu was far from the only watcher to pale.

A small, chubby, dirt-caked hand was pressed against the wall of the cave, the child walking along side it for fear of falling in the dark. The small figure stepped forward, his tiny head finally in Wei Wuxian's line of sight.

"A-Yuan," Wen Qing whispered.

They hadn't forgotten him, per se. They knew Wei Wuxian was doing this for the Wen remnants. They knew A-Yuan was included in that group. They knew how unfair the whole situation was.

'Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead, and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground.'

A-Yuan stepped forward, now old enough to walk instead of toddling toward Wei Wuxian. He reached his hands out, extending them so he could be swept up in a hug.

Wei Wuxian stared back, unable to move.

Jiang Cheng stood equally frozen, watching the scene play out.

'Da-shixiong!' the children at Lotus Pier had shouted. Often, they wouldn't even be able to finish calling out to Wei Wuxian before being swept up and thrown into the air, giggling as he caught them over and over again. Jiang Cheng had rolled his eyes at the sight countless times, wondering where Wei Wuxian got so much energy from.

The current Jiang Cheng was struggling to remember why he had reacted that way.

"Xian-gege?" the child asked again.

Wei Wuxian didn't blink nor react. It was clear now that he had not been staring at A-Yuan but rather blankly into space, lost in another time.

Jiang Yanli looked up at him.

A gleaming silver blade pierced through her throat.

Jin Zixuan flinched back at the sight. Jiang Yanli bit her lip, resisting the urge to look away.

A similar expression covered Wei Wuxian's face, his eyes bloodshot and wide. Wei Wuxian's hands were shaking. A-Yuan, thinking he was about to be picked up, reached out once more.

The Yiling Patriarch remained where he was, neither reaching back nor moving to stand.

In moments like this, Madam Yu couldn't help but recall the clammoring that had occurred when they first heard of Jiang Yanli's demise. The simulation's revelation, given without context and yet believed wholeheartedly, had been enough to convince the past's Yu Ziyuan:

'I told you!' she had shrieked. 'I told you he'd bring nothing but trouble to our sect. And look — look what he's-and now he's-'

She had been shocked, then. She hadn't fully doubted it, however. Instead, she had gone right to threatening Wei Wuxian, promising she'd get dogs to eat his corpse.

(As though he hadn't experienced enough of that in his youth.)

~~(Was that fair to say? Was the Yiling Patriarch now, barely into his twenties, not also a youth? Was the teenager who had been thrown into the Burial Mounds not also far too young to pay for Madam Yu's mistake?)~~

In front of Madam Yu, the real Jiang Yanli stood still, watching the simulation with tears forming in her eyes. There was nothing Madam Yu could say to comfort her. She had no right.

Clouds passed over the moon, further darkening the cave. After a few moments, an elderly woman, Granny Wen, walked in.

"A-Yuan! That's enough!" she whispered harshly, picking the boy up. "Don't disturb the Young Master right now."

"Xian-ge?" A-Yuan asked, looking over the woman's shoulder.

Wei Wuxian's gaze remained unchanged, focused at the ground.

Night passed by. Eventually, morning came. Wei Wuxian was lying down once more, but had otherwise not moved from where he was.

Jiang Cheng glanced at the cave opening. When they'd heard footsteps approach, it was from Granny Wen looking for A-Yuan. At the time, Jiang Cheng had half-expected their source to be his future self. It would make sense, he had thought. The alliance's invasion was the next event they knew of. Maybe, just maybe, the future Jiang Cheng had arrived to warn Wei Wuxian. Maybe the Patriarch had been too dazed to respond in time. Maybe Jiang Cheng hadn't wanted Wei Wuxian to die.

Jiang Yanli's white robes had been dyed red with blood. Jiang Cheng held two finger to her neck, checking for a pulse. Short breaths were continuing to come out of her. When Wei Wuxian approached, Jiang Cheng threw a sudden punch toward his face.

'What happened?!' he demanded. 'Didn't you say you could control it?! Didn't you say that it'd be fine?!'

A more than understandable reaction. You would have to be delusional to expect anything else.

~~And what about burning down the Burial Mounds? Killing Wei Wuxian? Massacering the Wen remnants? In the end, it wasn't by Wei Wuxian that Jiang Yanli had met her end.~~

Footsteps were appraoching. Jiang Cheng stared at the entrance again, waiting for his other self to arrive.

Once again, A-Yuan peaked his head in instead.

Relief instantly came over Jiang Cheng.

(Relief he wouldn't be feeling if he genuinely believed his other self could be trying to save them.)

"Xian-gege!" A-Yuan whisper-shouted, wanting to be heard but not found by his elders. "Xian-gege, come play?"

He held out one of the sad, worn-down dolls his grandmother had made him. Wei Wuxian was unmatched when it came to acting out the radish-eating monster that doll was meant to be.

Usually, at least.

"Xian-gege?"

A-Yuan was right before him again, holding the doll out once more. A determined look formed on his face.

"Xian-gege, let's play."

No response was given.

Wen Ruohan took several steps closer to Wei Wuxian, analyzing him closely. It was almost comical, how different he and Wen Ruohan were in their respective final moments. Even after losing countless cultivators to an ultimately meaningless battle, Wen Ruohan had been nothing but gleeful about his capture of Nie Mingjue. Wei Wuxian, who had killed far more at a much smaller manpower cost, looked about as far from that as one could be.

'His body is full of resentment,' Wen Ruohan observed. 'After having to use the seal like he did, I suppose that makes sense.'

Was his dispondance right now partly because of that? It was hard to say. The lingering effects of overfilling a demonic cultivator's body with resentment were entirely unknown.

Wei Wuxian was the first demonic cultivator.

The great sects had destroyed him for that.

The Wen child continued trying to get Wei Wuxian's attention, making numerous requests to play. Concern was clear in the child's gaze but a lack of understanding prevented him from stopping his attempts. The world seemed coated with a red haze.

A scream was heard in the distance.

Wei Wuxian blinked once.

"What was that?!" Nie Mingjue demanded, marching to the entrance of the cave. "What just-"

He froze, his eyes widening in horror. The other watchers rushed over as well.

In the distance, at the edge of the Burial Mounds, the orange glow of a fire surrounded a meager settlement there.

More screams followed.

At last, Wei Wuxian stood. He marched to the same entrance as the watchers, moving through them seamlessly like they weren't even there.

And they indeed weren't.

They could not interfere. They could not help.

Lan Wangji could taste his powerlessness. It was a familiar sensation, now.

That sensation only intensified with every scream they heard. Wei Wuxian left the cave fully, beginning to stumble down the hill toward the light. A-Yuan followed close behind.

The screams got louder. Wei Wuxian began to run.

Finally, after what felt like an eternity, they found someone running in the opposite direction.

"Granny Wen!" Wei Wuxian shouted. "What's going-"

"We're under attack!" the woman shouted. "They got through! The sects! It's the sects! I saw the flag of the Jiang Sect down there!"

As if ice water had been dunked over their heads, the watchers collectively froze.

The small bit of hope Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng had clung to about their future selves vanished in an instant.

'No.' Jiang Cheng shook his head, swallowing once. 'No, maybe she just… maybe it's somehow-'

“What? But the barrier — no, it doesn’t matter,” Wei Wuxian shook his head, picking the child by his legs up and handing him over. “Take A-Yuan and hide in the demon-slaughtering cave!”

The old woman struggled to grab hold of the child, bearing his weight through sheer adrenaline even as the young boy struggled in her arms. Looking at this sight, anyone who tried to describe her as a threat would almost certainly be laughed out of the room.

And yet, at this time, their future selves would surely disagree.

“A barrier?” Lan Qiren repeated, not wanting to speculate about his own future self quite yet. “When did he set that up?”

It was hard to tell. Wei Wuxian had been in the burial mounds for quite some time. The instinctive fear people had of the land had decreased the longer people were shown to live there. Hadn’t they already seen many aspiring disciples of the Patriarch come far closer to the mounds than anyone would have before this decade? Those disciples hadn’t made it past the corpses, of course, but their attempts had seemed comedic rather than asinine. With the rising tensions between Wei Wuxian and the sects, perhaps a barrier wasn’t a surprise.

But, if that was the case, how had the sects gotten by?

The first option — and the one most watchers immediately came to — was Wei Wuxian. Just a few moments before they had seen the state he was in. Expecting someone, no matter how brilliant they usually were, to maintain a barrier under the stress and sleeplessness Wei Wuxian was experiencing was foolish at best.

The second option was that the sects had simply broken it open. Exhausted as he was, Wei Wuxian may not have noticed until too late.

The third option, which no one present wanted to speak out loud, had to do one of the only guests the Burial Mounds had previously allowed in without question.

A group of cultivators flew across the sky. When one approached the entrance to the Burial Mounds, the corpses surrounding the site roared. It was possible that the corpses themselves were the barrier Wei Wuxian had mentioned a short while before. Either way, they served as a clear no-entry point.

However, when Jiang Wanyin stepped forward, the corpses stepped aside. They came back to prevent the Jiang disciples from following him, but not a single one moved to touch Jiang Cheng.

‘Wait at the bottom of the mountain,’ Sect Leader Jiang had instructed. ‘I’ll go alone.’

He had been let in once before.

Surely, after the Pledge Confrence, Wei Wuxian would have told the corpses to keep him out?

‘Huh? It’s you,’ Jin Ling commented, meeting Wei Wuxian as Mo Xuanyu for the first time. ‘What? You lost your memory after you were driven away? You don’t even recognize our coat of arms?'

Wei Wuxian had made a soft noise of realization, finally understanding what sect Mo Xuanyu had been a part of.

'Hey, what are you muttering about over there?!'

Ignoring him, Wei Wuxian had continued, 'At the first siege of the Burial Mounds, Jiang Cheng ranked first, and Jin Guangshan must have been second. How hilarious that I've got his bastard son's body now. What a mess.'

'Jiang Cheng had ranked first.' That wasn't a rumor Wei Wuxian heard; just experiencing the battle was enough to tell him that.

(Of course he would rank first. Jiang Yanli was dead. Wei Wuxian had-

But he han't.

But he still-

But this couldn't-)

"NO!"

The two adults looked down at once, panic and exhaustion nearly making Wei Wuxian slap A-Yuan's grabbing hand off his robes. Luckily, he managed to stop himself just in time. He panted heavily, still barely in a state to stand, much less fight.

"A-Yuan, let go."

"No! I'm not! I'm not! Xian-gege, come with us," he shouted, grabbing on tighter and resisting the adult's pulls with all his might. He might not understand all the details of what was happening, but the child was far from stupid. He had lived through the Jin Sect's internment camps. He knew what Wei Wuxian separating would mean.

"A-Yuan, let go."

Through tears, the child continued to shake his head.

"Come with us!" the boy bawled. "Please! Please, Xian-gege. Don't go! Don't-"

With a quick flick of his hand, Wei Wuxian threw a talisman onto the boy's chest. Before a second had passed, A-Yuan went limp and closed his eyes.

"Take him and go!" Wei Wuxian ordered, breaking into a run. Granny Wen nodded once, holding the boy closer to her chest as she began making her way up the hill. However, far from being a deadly cultivator, her progress was agonizingly slow.

Wen Qing, watching her mother's aunt flee, was filled with a sense of crushing, agonizing despair.

‘Please make it out,’ she begged. ‘Please, don’t let them be noticed.’

And yet, with every stumble the elderly woman took on her way up the hill, the meager hope Wen Qing had faded bit by bit.

The simulation moved along, following after Wei Wuxian as he raced toward the houses down the hill. They burned orange now, setting the dry field aglow much like the setting sun had a few segments ago.

If one had to pinpoint the biggest difference between now and then, it would be the screams currently filling the air.

Jiang Yanli winced when the cries began and flinched every time one was cut off abruptly. Jin Zixuan moved close, trying to wrap his arms around her in a mimicry of a hug. Jiang Cheng remained distant.

A voice that was vaguely recognizable was crying out in pain.

Both the attackers and attacked were likely to have voices the watchers could recognize. Right now, however, only one side had a chance of making those sounds.

A few weeks ago, Nie Mingjue would have been delighted to know the last of the Wens would sound like that. He was sure his other self was ecstatic to be a cause.

In fact, his other self had probably leapt at the chance to take part.

~~And to think he had once thought of himself as someone who spared civillians. Turned out that only counted for innocents not named ‘Wen.’~~

Bile rose up in his throat.

Wei Wuxian didn’t hesitate for a moment longer. Finally close enough to take part, he raised his flute to his lips and sent out an urgent call.

Short and simple, yet filled with power.

Stop the intruders.

The original citizens of the Burial Mounds had spent years with their patriarch’s guests. While their brains no longer functioned like a human’s, recognition was still possible.

Nie Mingjue himself was a perfect example of that:

When the headless body of the former Sect Leader had heard Lan Xichen’s song, it had frozen and turned to face him. That had been the final piece of evidence needed for the future’s Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji to confirm that it was Nie Mingjue they had been collecting bit by bit.

At the time, Nie Mingjue had been disgusted by what had happened to his body. It had been a grave violation of his corpse and a signal of just how terribly the far future had gone.

The brief thought that he might be committing fewer injustices right now if this version was already a fierce corpse was hard to ignore.

Low, inhuman growls indicative of the dead rang out as the corpses began to move. Now, the screams of the invading cultivators joined the fray. At least a dozen cultivators who were caught off guard fell before they could react. Corpses bit into their necks, ripping off heads in a violent manner. Hands shot out of the ground, grabbing onto the legs of fleeing young masters and pulling them to the ground. They would be torn limb from limb shortly after.

Every cultivator had come here knowing the danger, however. Orders were swiftly called out, the combatants regrouping into a more defensive formation. Standard form, swiftly executed; there were no complaints to give.

Lan Qiren wondered where the strange sense of numbness he was feeling came from. These cultivators screaming out now included the Lan. He could see white robes becoming stained with blood. That wasn't a surprise. They had known from the beginning that this would be the case.

What was a surprise was the use of Lan tactics by those not in the clan.

In hindsight, however, it probably shouldn't have been a shock. Most of the older generation had died in the war. The leaders of this battle were primarily people who had, for a time, studied at Gusu — who had been Lan Qiren's students at some point or another.

In the very first segment, the watchers had been blissfully, insurmountably ignorant of what had transpired in the previous twenty years. They, unsurprisingly, had reacted with prejudice.

'That man is no longer the boy you once knew,' Lan Qiren declared, sending the Yiling Patriarch a look of absolute disgust. 'If he was willing to turn to — to create demonic cultivation, there's no telling what his limits are.'

The army had recovered quickly. The cultivators stood grouped into circles, prioritizing safety over effectiveness. Any soldier lost was a fierce corpse the Patriarch gained. And yet, despite that, one would break formation every once in a while. Each time, it was with the express purpose of skewering a hiding, elderly Wen.

Students of Lan Qiren — disciples who, in the current time, were predominantly children — were dying in droves. Lan Qiren should be mourning them. If all was well, 'Teacher Lan' would be filled with rage at the demonic cultivator responsible for these deaths.

Instead, throughout it all, all he felt was numb.

Wei Wuxian rushed forward, joining the fray. He sought out all the hiding Wen he could, seeking to bring those too weak to run to shelter. The glow of the fire cast a red light upon the field, making it difficult to distinguish what sect each cultivator was from. It wasn't impossible, however. There was a distinctive gleam of gold embroidered on the dark uniforms of the Nie sect that those familiar with the robes could not miss.

There, holding the decapitated head of a Wen in his hand, was Nie Mingjue.

The Sect Leader shut his eyes, but that image remained seared into his mind. His other-self had not been smiling, but there was no regret or hesitation in his gaze either. That Nie Mingjue had seen the elderly, sickly, malnourished Wen and still chose to-

"Open your eyes."

Upon registering the command, Nie Mingjue did. He flinched at the vibrant sea of blood growing before him, not having fully realized he'd closed his eyes, and look over at the person who had just spoken to him.

"What?! You-!"

Nie Mingjue cut off.

Wen Ruohan calmly gazed back.

Sect Leader Nie continued on, not needing to take part in a defensive formation and thus striking down any corpse in his path with a deadly grace. The cultivation he used was tinged with resentment and corruption, a tell-tale sign of the Nie Sect's unconventional cultivation style.

The resentful corpses of freshly-slain Wen stood up to face him.

"Keep looking," Wen Ruohan recommended. "It's the least you can do. I certainly never looked away."

Nie Mingjue nearly scoffed, biting back, "Because you never regretted anything shown!"

The unpoken admission about his own feelings froze Lan Xichen in place. Despite keeping his eyes on the fight, he couldn't help listening to their words.

(It was against the rules to eavesdrop.)

(Look where their rules had gotten them.)

Wei Wuxian paused, looking down at the decapitated body of one of the people he had given up everything to protect. Numerous arrows were implanted into the woman's chest, a slash from a sword or saber having cut through her clothes and inadvertently exposed her chest. This was a reoccuring trend now. Every hiding space he looked had a distinct lack of living Wen. Thus far, he hadn't managed to save even a single one.

He knelt, guarded by numerous corpses behind him, and tied pieces of the Wen woman's shirt together, covering her again. It was a futile attempt — the beheaded woman had no capacity for shame — but the task was dutifully completed nonetheless.

The corpse tensed, then jerked. As Wei Wuxian stepped back, the Wen woman rose to her feet once more. The empty stump where her neck had been continued to bleed, but the woman's nails could function as weapons in place of her teeth.

Though Wen were still being made into corpses, they were not Wei Wuxian's enemies at the current time.

'If only I had…'

Instead of finishing that thought, Wen Ruohan spoke aloud:

"It's not that I have no regrets."

Nie Mingjue jerked, having been too absorbed in the battle around them to remember the conversation being had.

"You… What?"

"Many of my choices in this future were… impulsive," Wen Ruohan continued. "A result of impatience. If I had planned better, someone as capable as A-Ying would never have been thrown into the Burial Mounds alone."

Both Madam Yu and Jiang Cheng bristled at the comment, feeling revolution at the affectionate address. However-

"Don't look away from this."

At that conclusion, no one present could speak up. Wen Ruohan had turned back toward the simulation, effectively ending the conversation. After a moment, Nie Mingjue did the same.

Nie, Jiang, Jin, and Lan disciples were falling steadily, brought down by the corpse's fierce attacks even with their careful strategies. It was a sight that would inspire feelings of revulsion and hatred against demonic cultivation in any normal cultivator.

In fact, remembering their reaction to the very first scene the simulation had shown them, it was no exaggeration to say that plans to enact revenge against him would have immediately been made.

And yet-

'The Sunshot Campaign was a battlefield,' Luo Qingyang argued, frowning at the hypocrisy of the sects. 'Under that logic, everyone who participated in battle would be 'killing indiscriminately."

Nie Mingjue's future self had been impressed by her words, commending her bravery.

The current Nie Mingjue cut down the revived corpses of Wen without a trace of doubt.

It was a grusome sight. Not particularly exhilerating either, given the context behind it. Despite that, everyone from Wen Ruohan and Wen Qing to Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang kept their eyes on the scene before them.

(Jin Guangshan watched the Jin soldiers carefully, wondering if he had any plans to capture Wei Wuxian. While it could be argued the Yiling Patriarch was too dangerous to risk leaving alive, it was far from an easy choice to make.)

Wei Wuxian fought and fought. Though he never once called upon his blade, no one in or outside of the simulation would underestimate the danger of his music. As notes continued to flurry by, the battle wore on and on.

Lan Wangji gazed over the battlefield for the tenth time, taking count of all the Lan present. With every glance, he found himself furrowing his brow further at the lack of his own presence in the battle. Not even his brother — physically identical to him in all ways except expression — was anywhere to be found.

(It should be reassuring that he wasn't joining this atrocity.)

(Instead, all it left him with was more questions.)

(If his other-self truly did nothing, simply believing that not participating in the battle was enough to keep his hands clean, then Lan Wangji knew that nothing he did in the far future would be enough to warrant forgiveness.)

'Why aren't you here?' he asked himself. 'You saw A-Yuan. You met the residence of the Burial Mounds. How could you let this happen? How could you not even try to save them?!'

Morally speaking, he was in a far better place than all the soldiers actively in combat.

It didn't feel that way, however.

A flash of purple lightning was emitted from the side.

The three Jiangs present paled at once. They did not whisper desperate denials as they had at the start of the simulation, when Wei Wuxian's death was first revealed. Instead, a horrified acceptance seemed to settle over them.

Zidian snapped forth, tearing a fierce corpse to shreds.

The sight of a teenage Wei Wuxian being beaten by that very same whip at the Wen's behest filled the minds of more than one watcher here. Madam Yu tensed even further.

Though they could not see Jiang Cheng yet, the purple light given off every time the whip made contact with someone was getting closer and closer to where the Patriarch was.

'Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian is dead!'

'Really? Who killed him?'

‘Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, leader of the Jiang Clan.’

Wei Wuxian had denied this. Rumors weren’t always accurate.

(They weren’t always inaccurate either, though.)

Even with the loud battle all around, the distinctive crackling sound given off by the legendary whip was easy to pinpoint as it approached. Purple flashed from Wei Wuxian’s right.

“Damn it! Where is your future-self?!” Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but snap, glaring at Lan Wangji. “Wei Wuxian needs help! And-”

(And…)

(And Jiang Cheng’s future-self clearly wasn’t offering any.)

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli whispered. Said heir pulled back, looking up and meeting Lan Wangji’s wide eyes.

(He knew it wasn’t fair to say that. He knew it made no sense to blame him. And yet-)

“We found them!” a loud voice shouted from the distance. While normally that wouldn’t be enough to make anyone mid-fight pause, the unusual nature of the words had Wei Wuxian looking back.

Granny Wen’s head had been mounted atop a rogue cultivator’s spear.

Wen Qing felt the world slow down. All sound seemed to disappear. All color left her line of sight.

First, her parents.

Then, her clan.

Then, her brother — murdered by his captors and then turned into a fierce corpse.

And now, Granny Wen.

But then…

“If… she’s there….” Wen Qing forced herself to swallow, her hands starting to tremble. “...Where’s A-Yuan?”

No one could respond.

In the next few seconds, several eternaties seemed to transpire. Answers to that question formed in everyone’s minds. Jiang Yanli blinked rapidly, feeling her tears at last start to fall. At the same time, bile rose in Lan Xichen’s mouth. They felt sick beyond compare.

They were sure everyone who could see their future selves there felt far worse.

(Lan Qiren, who appeared to be leading the Lan Sect's charge in the future Lan Xichen's unexplained absence, was so pale he seemed nearly translucent.)

And Wei Wuxian, upon laying his eyes on that same sight, had the same thought run through his mind.

'Granny Wen?' he wondered.

Though the battle continued around him, the world seemed to slow around Wei Wuxian.

'But then… what about A-Yuan?'

A brief image of A-Yuan — of that sweet, sweet, thoughtful child sitting in a pile of mud — flashed through Wei Wuxian's mind.

Wen Ruohan briefly wondered if Wei Wuxian would be the last person in that world to think kindly of a Wen.

(He didn't have to wonder whether he was to blame.)

'But if A-Yuan…. But then-'

Wei Wuxian had stopped playing his flute entirely. His already rapid breaths started coming out faster and faster. Resentful energy flooded the surrounding space as the famed Yiling Patriarch started to — for lack of a better description — hyperventalate.

If Granny Wen was dead, then A-Yuan had almost certainly been found.

The inhuman growls of resentful corpses filled the air. The Wen who had been farming these very lands were no more. Fire blazed in the distance.

If this was the Burial Mounds now, then any chance of A-Yuan's future was gone.

Countless screams resounded as more cultivators fell.

If A-Yuan was gone, then-

Then-

Everything Wei Wuxian had sacrificed — everything Wei Wuxian had done — flashed across the screen. Jiang Yanli's pale corpse stood out prominantly in the display. The cries of her infant son sounded out as well.

If A-Yuan was dead….

'Then what was the point?'

……

…….

……..

……..

Something had snapped.

No watcher would be able to explain why, but they all unquestionably knew this to be true.

A strange calm abruptly settled over the watchers. As though ~~he~~ they had come to a new understanding of the situation, all the hatred and guilt in their hearts simply disappeared.

Wei Wuxian looked up at the battle before him. Within his robes, directly over his heart, a small object began emitting a red glow.

As though one with the thoughts of their Patriarch, the watchers all knew his intentions even before he moved. As such, it came as no surprise when he reached into his robe and removed the Tiger Seal so coveted by the world.

"It's the Stygian Tiger Seal!" someone shouted. The man's words were muffled and distorted by the ringing of the surrounding resentment, but the desire within them was clear nonetheless.

Jin Zixuan nearly laughed when he saw all the members of his own sect perk up at the weapon, not displaying any of the fear he had expected. In fact, if it weren't for the wave of serenity they were all feeling right now, he probably would have cried.

Power flowed into the seal, but the instructions imbued within were not what any of the watchers present had expected.

In hindsight, perhaps they should have known that this would come.

The resentment rose and rose. With it, the ringing became louder.

Piiiiiiiiinnnnnggggg.

A strange lightheadedness filled the watchers now. Though slightly different in flavor, it was a familiar feeling. In the last segment, an intensity like this had appeared shortly before they were knocked out. Some of the weaker members could feel that transition happening already.

And yet…

‘I can’t fall asleep now.’

‘I can’t let myself look away from this.’

It was the least they owed.

Logically, they should raise their own power to fight back as strongly as possible. Logically, spiritual cultivation would be the best way to strike back.

'Spiritual energy is energy, but resentment and wrath can become types of energy too. Why can't we make good use of them? When Yu the great tamed the flood, obstruction was the inferior method and redirection was superior.'

For some reason, at that moment, fighting back against Wei Wuxian's energy felt wrong. And so, instead of resisting it, they now allowed the energy to flow through them. Despite being resentment, this energy had none of the aggressiveness they had come to expect. As if by unspoken agreement, the watchers silently and yet collectively begged the resentment to allow them to stay.

(Right now, the only thing here they were not scared of was Wei Wuxian. The instinctive resistance of resentment they had all been born and raised to accept seemed so trivial, now.)

‘Let me see.’

‘Let me see it.’

‘Please, let me see.’

And this unusual resentment, carrying no hostility to the people all around, was happy to oblige.

After all, what was filling the Stygian Tiger Seal now was not a command to attack.

The gossiping tavern guests, serving as their introduction to the simulation, had disagreed on nearly every detail here. Whether it was three of five thousand people in the Nightless City; who, exactly, had dealt the finishing blow against Wei Wuxian. There was one thing they had all agreed on, however:

‘He destroyed the seal before he died. At least he did one good thing.’

And now, that very seal was filling itself with more energy than they had ever seen before. Countless cultivators were reaching toward it, trying to pry the near-mythic weapon from Wei Wuxian’s hands. However, right as the closest man seemed to brush the tips of his fingers against Wei Wuxian’s sleeve, blinding red light filled the peak and everyone within a thousand meter radius was sent flying back.

As was Jin Guangshan, the only watcher who still felt fear when resentful energy approached. Flung several feet back and crashing onto the floor, the sect leader of the Jin sect fell unconscious a moment later.

Not even Jin Zixuan glanced back at him.

How could they? The blinding red light of the Stygian Tiger Seal had the invading sects flinching away, but what reason would the watchers have to do the same?

While they did feel some fear, it was not, in this moment, for themselves.

“Wei Wuxian, run!” Jiang Cheng shouted.

The blinding light faded. The Yiling Patriarch stood still. The dirt around him was reddish-brown with blood. However, compared to the intoxicating scarlet of a moment before, the world now seemed almost completely devoid of color.

From Wei Wuxian’s hands, the shattered remains of the Stygian Tiger Seal fell to the floor.

And, in the absence of its power — in the sudden lack of instructions or guidance or intent — the corpses turned their hunger on the greatest source of energy on the mounds instead.

“...Hey, what are the corpses-”

“Huh?!”

“Hey! They’re all-!”

“Oh, Heavens,” the Lan Qiren gasped.

The commander of this attack, standing proudly as the lightning-shouded leader of the Jiang Sect, froze. For the first time this night, uncertainty seemed to flash in his eyes.

“Wei Wuxian?” he asked.

Jiang Yanli stared, unable to move.

Lan Wangji could not breathe.

All the while, fierce corpses piled on, biting into Wei Wuxian in a viscious mockery of his first excursion into the mounds. Countless hands tore into his fragile robes, tearing flesh from his limbs and opening their mouths wide to eat their fill.

The watchers had become quite sensitive to resentful energy throughout this experience. Now that they had willingly allowed resentful energy into their souls, they were probably nearly identical to resentful spirits — in terms of physcial make-up, if nothing else. At this moment, they would have heard without question any command the Yiling Patriarch gave.

A request for the corpses to stop never came.

'I heard, since he cultivated the dark path, his powers backfired during battle and he was torn to a fine powder by his own ghost soldiers. If so, serves him right. The ghost soldiers he had were like mad dogs, biting everyone they came across! In the end, they turned their fangs on him!'

It had seemed strangely fitting at the time. A classic case of one man's hubris being his own downfall. 'Of course he lost control. He was a fool for thinking he could master resentment in the first place.'

Wei Wuxian's screams filled the air, yet the resentment remained steady.

He had 'done it to himself?'

Not even Madam Yu would be able to say that now.

Lan Qiren stood still, trying to not envision what every crunch and chew referred to in the pile of bodies that now covered Wei Wuxian, blocking out any sight of him. With every second that passed, that became a harder and harder task.

(The simulated cultivators were cheering. This was justice to them.)

"...What have we done?" Lan Qiren murmured, not seeing the way Madam Yu flinched at his words.

The cheering was now so loud that the corpses could no longer be heard. It was hard to call the sound that replaced it pleasant, however. The near-feral shouts of the surrounding cultivators displayed no aversion to this series of events. Of the few who did not show happiness, their gazes were not directed at Wei Wuxian. Rather, it was the broken remains of the Stygian Tiger Seal that caused the dissatisfaction they displayed.

While the simulation was loud, the watchers were dead silent. Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang were frozen still, unwilling to look away and yet having to fight with every instinct in their body to remain. The sight before them was gruesome and disturbing beyond anything they had experienced on a night hunt before.

And it was happening to Wei Wuxian.

Nie Mingjue couldn't help but recall his own body, mutilated and desecrated in a future not too far away. Looking upon his future-self, he wondered if it was deserved.

Lan Xichen briefly turned to look at Lan Wangji. The young Lan stood beside their Uncle, his hands clenched together. Neither of them knew where their future selves were.

(In some ways, that was almost worse.)

The carnage continued.

Jiang Cheng glanced back, his eyes landing on his future-self.

Neither the other cultivators' joy nor deep despair could be seen. In fact, even the anger the future Jiang Wanyin constantly spit out was nowhere to be found now. The future Sect Leader Jiang gazed at the scraps of blood-soaked fabric that used to be Wei Wuxian with a chillingly blank gaze.

'It's like he's become one of the Twin Jades,' Jiang Cheng scoffed. 'Some 'Two Prides of Yunmeng' we ended up being.'

It was truly laughable.

(Especially since, right now, the real versions of both of the Twin Jades were showing far more on their faces than the future Jiang Cheng. The current version couldn't read his future self at all — didn't even want to try. Whether he was feeling guilt or relief or vindication or regret didn't matter. It wouldn't change what was happening to Wei Wuxian now.)

A finger flew into the air. Wei Wuxian's — dropped by a clumsy corpse. Someone in the crowd shouted at the others to invade the Demon Slaughtering Cave. Whether they were looking for survivors or treasure was unclear, but many surged to follow regardless. A moment later, the displaced finger was gabbed by a new corpse, swallowed a moment later.

For the first time since the simulation began, Wen Ruohan looked away.

The simulation began moving away from this outcome, the fires growing dimmer as they faded into the distance.

Lan Wangji bit his tongue, tasting blood as he forced himself to remain seated. Attacking the simulation would do nothing. He would simply phase through if he tried.

And yet-

(How dare the great sects calls themselves 'righteous?' How, when Wei Ying had done so much good and ended up like this? How dare any of them say his name?)

"The Yiling Patriarch has fallen!" one cultivator shouted. The cheers turned into a chant, each cultivator reveling in their victory.

'Why? Why? Why?'

Even Lan Wangji didn't truly know what he was asking.

The screen darkened, then lit once more. Now, they were in a tavern. Though it was a different location, it appeared nearly identical to the first scene the simulation had shown. With every word that was said, that feeling became increasingly clear.

"The Yiling Patriarch has died? Who could have killed him?"

"Who other than his shidi, Jiang Cheng, putting an end to his own shixiong for the greater good. Jiang Cheng led the four clans of Yunmeng, LanlingJin, GusuLan, and QinghеNie to destroy his 'den,' the Burial Mounds."

They had seen it themselves. Jiang Cheng had not done that.

~~He might as well have.~~

Although it mader sense the moment he thought about it, the last thing Jiang Cheng expected to hear after those words was cheers. And yet-

“I must say, good riddance!”

“Good riddance, indeed! We’ve finally eliminated this scourge?”

“‘We?’” Wen Ruohan repeated mockingly, raising a brow. However, while the pronoun wasn’t accurate in any literal sense, it was still a telling indication of the general consensus among the public:

The whole world was against Wei Wuxian. If something happened to him, it was a victory for the world.

Jin Zixuan shut his eyes, but couldn’t get the image of Wei Wuxian being torn apart out of his head.

“If not for the YungmengJiang Clan adopting and teaching him, he would have been a beggar living on the streets! Forget causing mayhem like he had these days — he wouldn’t even be able to lift a sword!”

Madam Yu wondered how many times she had shouted something to that effect before.

“The head of the Jiang Clan raised him like his own child, yet he defected and became the enemy of the cultivation world, bringing shame upon the Jiang Clan and even leading to its near extermination! He is the prime example of biting the hand that feeds him!”

This time, neither Madam Yu nor Jiang Cheng could withhold a flinch.

‘You damn brat!’ the prideful Madam shouted. ‘I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!’

Then, fresh off a staged fight, Jiang Cheng turned to the world and said, ‘Wei Wuxian had betrayed the sect and publicly regards all cultivation sects as his enemy! Yunmeng Jiang hereby expells him, breaking all ties and drawing a clear line between us! From now on, no matter what he does, it will have nothing to do with Yunmeng Jiang!’

They had wondered, right at the beginning, how Wei Wuxian had gotten such a terrible reputation.

(They should have known that only the words of the gentry would hold this much weight.)

One bar patron scoffed, swirling his drink in his cup as he commented, “Jiang Cheng allowed this fellow to live for far too long. If I were him, at the time of his defection I wouldn't have just stabbed him. In fact, I would have thoroughly examined my clan's disciples so he couldn't do the crazy things they did later on!"

(Sandu had impaled Wei Wuxian. The point was to prove to everyone that they were no longer allies. It was annoying to a cultivator. It could be deadly to someone without a core.)

Wen Qing couldn't help but send a sharp glare Jiang Wanyin's way. The boy simply shrank down further at her gaze, a deep shame coloring his cheeks. The anger Wen Qing had half-expected him to send her way never came.

(Why? This all started the moment she asked Wei Wuxian for help. Why wouldn't he blame her? Was he accepting her glare because he knew he was the most to blame?)

But…

(She had asked for help. Jiang Cheng had led the siege ~~using Wei Wuxian's own core~~ and didn't help when asked to. Lan Wangji was nowhere to be found, simply allowing his sect to launch this attack. Nie Huaisang had stayed back, not lifting his voice to intervene. Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan had not understood their own sects, inviting Wei Wuxian straight into a trap. Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, and Lan Qiren had not investigated the Wens themselves, 'ignoring justice and morality' for the sake of their own prejudices. Madam Yu and Madam Jin had contributed through the manner in which they had raised their children. Both Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan had contributed in ways that were unquestionable.)

When the Wen had attacked the Jiang, blame had been thrown around liberally. Accusations had flown left and right, no one truly coming out unscathed. Now, with the Jiang, Jin, Lan, and Nie attacking the remaining Wen, the watchers seemed too exhausted to even attempt that.

Wen Qing's thoughts kept her from focusing on the simulation, but it was hard to say anything of value was being missed.

"That's all hearsay. Although Jiang Cheng was one of the main forces, he did not give Wei Wuxian the final blow. He was a cultivator of the Demonic Path. They say his powers backfired on him and he was ripped to pieces."

Laughter broke out throughout the simulation.

Not a single watcher joined in.

"Ha! That's karma," the bartender announced. "The ghost soldiers he created were like wild dogs, biting everyone they came across! It serves him right to be chewed to death."

Jiang Yanli gazed at the floor, her expression empty. A cold, resentful anger she was unused to was filling her mind. Even then, she knew her own powerlessness was what hurt the most.

"But, if not for Jiang Cheng making a plan that aimed at Wei Wuxian's weakness, the siege might not have succeeded!" an elderly man pointed out. "Should I remind you folks of the item Wei Wuxian possesses?"

Noises of agreement were heard all around.

Jiang Cheng was now paler than a ghost.

Most of what the travelers had said so far was misguided or distorted half-truths. In the initial scene, the gossipers hadn't been sure whether it was three or five thousand people Wei Wuxian had killed. None of the civillians really knew what was going on. Putting too much trust in the nonsense they said would be setting yourself up for failure.

(But there was a chance it was true. Hadn't Jiang Cheng himself been wondering why the Burial Mound's defenses were so weak?)

It probably wasn't true.

(But he couldn't be sure.)

"He's most certainly out of his mind."

"It's a good thing he destroyed that evil weapon before he died. If it was left behind in this world and continued to harm humankind, his sins would have been even worse."

Wen Qing, Nie Mingjue, and Nie Huaisang glanced over at the Jin Clan members sitting to the side. Upon doing that, they noticed Jin Zixuan staring at his father with a heavy look in his eyes.

"But, you know, if his soul is summoned back-"

"And unleash a vengeful spirit upon this land? Who would be crazy enough to do that?"

They all knew the answer already.

And yet, despite everything else lining up, Wei Wuxian had not been a vengeful spirit when summoned. Despite the way he died and the suffering he faced, he had been playful and unconcerned when returned to life.

'A-Xian, you were born with a smiling face,' Jiang Yanli said. 'Always smiling, never minding sorrowful things. No matter what situation you're in, you can always be happy.'

Years later, freshly brought back to life, Wei Wuxian would observe the summoning circle and binding scars on his arm with an expression that could be best described as playful.

'He was summoning a heinous spirit? But it couldn't have been me…. It must have been some lunatic!"

As if the great sects hadn't done far worse than him with far less cause.

"Oh, well…. You know, back then, Wei Wuxian was one of the most promising cultivators. Coming from a highly distinguished clan and finding success at a young age. How on earth did he end up where he is now?"

While every watcher answered that question in their heads, not one said it outloud.

If Jin Guangshan were awake and not knocked unconscious by the resentment from earlier, he might have flinched at the gazes others sent him.

“This proves that one can only cultivate by following the righteous path. Using dishonest practices will only seem helpful at first glance. Look at what happened in the end! Not even a whole corpse was left of him.”

“Not everything was because of his cultivation path,” the elderly patron pointed out. “Wei Wuxian’s personality is quite immoral. One’s deeds will be paid one way or another; what goes around always comes around.”

‘And yet the majority of the gentry walked away from this matter unscathed,’ Lan Wangji thought, his hands clenched into fists. ‘Including myself. I did nothing to help him, and yet get spoken of with reverence thirteen years later.’

~~Why hadn’t he helped?~~

The world darkened, then lit again. It was a bit misleading to say it had ‘lit up,’ however. A cloudy night sky hung over the quiet peaks of Gusu — instantly recognizable due to the foliage and architecture. The surroundings were lit by only a single lantern held in Lan Xichen’s hand. He walked nearly-silently, his face grave.

Cicadas hummed in the distance.

The real Lan Xichen frowned deeply. Far from looking forward to their appearances — as they had at the beginning of the segments — the watchers now seemed to dread making an appearance.

Stopping in front of the door to an isolated building, Lan Xichen tapped lightly.

“Wangji?”

No sound was heard from within.

If Lan Qiren had been ashamed before, it was nothing compared to the sickening feeling that filled him now.

‘Is he going to-’

Despite not having received an answer, Lan Xichen opened the door and entered. It was dark inside, no candle light to be found. Lan Xichen’s lamp continued to glow, casting a soft light on the large mass in the center of the room.

Lan Wangji narrowed his eyes and approached, desperate for a clearer view. However, as soon as the figure looked back, he froze.

(The Lans had not been the only ones wondered where Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen had been during the attack. Last they had seen the younger jade, he had been trying to stop Wei Wuxian from attacking the clans in the Nightless City. And yet somehow, in this short span of time…)

Lan Xichen stepped closer, allowing his brother to become visible to the watchers. The light, white underrobe he wore did nothing to hide the bandages covering his chest and arms.

Nor the still-bleeding wounds below.

Jiang Yanli gasped, pale. Nie Huaisang looked nauseous and even Nie Mingjue seemed taken aback. That was nothing compared to the reactions of the three Lans, however. While their reactions were muted compared to the rest of the watchers, the sheer horror in their gazes was unquestionable.

“Wangji,” Lan Xichen said again.

The second jade looked over, his eyes blinking tiredly with a vulnerability he had never allowed himself to show before. Barely able to stay conscious, he forced himself into a sitting position.

“No, Wangji, you don’t have to-”

“What is it?” Lan Wangji asked, interrupting Lan Xichen and pushing away the hands trying to set him back down. “Xiongzhang, what happened?”

The sheer desperation in Lan Wangji’s voice made it impossible for Lan Qiren to critisize his manners.

And yet, for several long, agonizing seconds, Lan Xichen remained quiet.

“Xiongzhang?” Lan Wangji asked again.

“...”

Lan Xichen pursed his lips together and then, at last, opened his mouth to speak:

“I’m sorry.”

The phrase said nothing and everything all at once. It only took a moment for it to be understood. In an instant, Hanguang-jun’s face became consumed by grief.

Lan Xichen looked away.

Someone seemed to be shouting the word 'no' in the distance, though Lan Wangji wasn’t sure who. For all he knew, it was his other-self. He couldn’t tell; he had never raised his voice quite like that before. It was impossible to confirm visually. At the moment, Lan Wangji couldn’t tear his eyes away from Lan Xichen's future-self.

‘What do you mean by that? Is... is 'I'm sorry' all you can say? How could we let this happen?’ he thought, unwilling to ask aloud. ‘How could you? How could I?’

His gaze fell on the injuries lining his other-self's back.

'What happened?'

The two jades of Lan were still speaking to each other, but the words were getting harder and harder to parse. They faded into the distance. At first, many watchers thought they were simply struggling to process the sound. However, it gradually became clear that this was also the doing of the simulation itself.

The sounds attached to this memory faded into the distance.

In that space, a few notes began to play.

Pale and shaking, Jin Zixuan found himself focusing on the music being played. It was a far more appealing option than continuing to watch the indomitable Hanguang-jun re-opening the wounds on his back as he screamed in grief.

(Even the Wen had never managed to bring him to his knees like this. At this moment, there was no trace of the prideful jade of Lan.)

Even without the musical talent of the Twin Jades or Wei Wuxian, the song slowly picking up in volume gradually became clear to Jin Zixuan. It was a soft melody played on a guqin — one of longing and hope.

(The one Lan Wangji sang for Wei Wuxian in the Xuanwu of Slaughter's cave.)

(The music could no longer be a comforting distraction now that Jin Zixuan had realized that.)

The music grew louder and louder, drowning out the words being said. It was a small mercy of privacy in a world that had completely destroyed all semblance of secrets among them.

More than one watcher was looking away.

(Even Wen Ruohan had closed his eyes.)

Somehow, watching this was harder than watching the violence that had been inflicted upon Wei Wuxian. Or perhaps it was that violence — that context — that made what they were seeing now so hard.

Red soaked the bandages along Lan Wangji's back as the song kept playing. It was only now, with the countless wounds torn open from Lan Wangji's shaking, that the watchers could clearly see just how extensive the damage was.

Lan Qiren couldn't breathe.

He remembered, now, that they had seen the scars of a discipline whip on Wangji's future-self's back. He remembered, now, being angered by the sight and wondering what his nephew could have done to warrant such a thing. They still didn't have a specific answer to that.

They didn't need one.

Regardless of what Lan Wangji had done, Wei Wuxian and the Wens had still died in the end.

(And to think that Hanguang-jun's forwardness with Wei Wuxian had once seemed like the biggest problem the simulation had to offer.)

Lan Qiren closed his eyes.

Lan Wangji tried to stand, but Lan Xichen pushed him down. Neither of them could be heard by the watchers now. However, as the music continued to play, Lan Wangji could be seen shaking his head once more.

If Nie Huaisang had to take a guess, he would bet the words 'Don't lie to me' were what Lan Wangji was saying right now.

A resolution was never shown. Instead, as tears began to fall from Lan Wangji's eyes, the simulation drew to a close.

With one final note, the song came to an end.

The world darkened shortly after.

Jiang Yanli blinked.

Light had returned. The in-between zone was the same boring white as always.

The watchers had not spoken much during this segment. They wanted to speak even less now.

For a brief moment, Nie Huaisang wondered if he should say something to prompt conversation. It didn't take long for him to decide against that, however. While they had all known this was coming, the actual moment of Wei Wuxian's death would be difficult to accept at the current point in time.

As such, Nie Huaisang simply scooted himself closer to her brother, internally lamenting his poor, destroyed chair.

~~Nie Mingjue had been part of the attack. He had led a large portion of the warriors who came to exterminate the Wen. While the number of Jiang and Jin was higher, his contribution could not be ignored.~~

‘Maybe painting fans instead training the ‘righteous, warrior way’ doesn’t seem so bad now, huh?’ Nie Huaisang thought.

~~Wei Wuxiang’s body being torn apart flashed in Nie Huaisang’s mind every time he closed his eyes.~~

Well, no point in dwelling on that. Nie Huaisang hated gore and violence on principle. Knowing the people involved in that sight did not help matters. Instead, he attempted to focus on the storytelling the spirits had arranged.

The melody of the song Lan Wangji had sung was the most direct interference the spirits had conducted so far. While they had jumped around in the order of events shown previously, this was the first combination of scenes they had enacted. The exact sound was not something they had heard before either. Neither Lan Wangji’s singing nor Wei Wuxian’s flute could be heard there; there was only a guqin.

Something Lan Wangji played after Wei Wuxian’s death? But even then, why insert it here? Had the spirits really grown a conscience and decided to care about their privacy now of all times? Or was it done at the suggestion of one of the juniors, lacking any manipulations at all?

Sizhui might have suggested it for privacy’s sake. Did the spirits go along with it just for that? To emphasize how personally one of them would be affected? To tell the watchers that, if they learned from this, things would work out better? Was it blaming them? Or was it a sign that, for all the love that had been there for Wei Wuxian, none of their actions had been enough?

(Lan Wangji certainly seemed to be interpreting it that way.)

(How funny, that he had once seemed to carry all the emotions of a jade statue. After the final scene of this segment, no one would be able to accuse him of that. The real version of the Second Jade had not lost composure to the same extent his future self had, but a faint tremble could be seen in his shoulders nonetheless.)

(Jiang Yanli’s open sobs seemed to cut deeper and deeper into him with every breath.)

Although Jin Zixuan sat near Jiang Yanli, he made no effort to speak. Both he and Jiang Cheng were sitting slouched over, lacking all the poise their mothers had raised them to present.

(Unbeknownst to Nie Huaisang, both were recalling the same scene right now.)

A group of civilian children were playing in the streets. Based on the items they held and the words being said, it quickly became clear that they were re-enacting the sunshot campaign.

The child playing Jin Guangyao volunteered himself as leader.

‘But I’m Nie Mingjue! I won the most battles and captured the most people. I should be the leader!’

And-

'You short-lived idiot.'

'Jin Zixuan, you died even before I did! You're even more short-lived!'

And then-

'Okay, okay. Let's stop fighting. I'm the Yiling Patriarch, so I'm the strongest. If you guys insist so much, I can be the leader.'

'No, no. I'm Sandu Shengshou. I'm the most powerful.'

'Jiang Cheng, how is it possible for you to be better than me? Is there even one time you didn't lose to me? How dare you say you're more powerful? Aren't you embarrassed?'

It had been embarrassing to watch at the time. However, embarrassing was not all it had been.

'Hmph. Why can't I be better than you? Don't you remember how you died?'

They certainly did, now. None of them would ever be able to forget. Even if Jiang Cheng's involvement was exaggerated somewhat, he had still-

The boy playing Wei Wuxian was shoved to the ground, his 'Stygian Tiger Seal' shattering on impact.

'Hey, why did you guys push me?' he asked. 'It was all of you against just me! That's not fair!'

A shudder went through Jiang Cheng's spiritual form.

In the segment they had just watched, a bleeding, exhausted Wei Wuxian had looked out over a seemingly endless battlefield with a pained expression. All around, the corpses of those he had lost everything to protect rose up again to fight.

Jiang Cheng's whip shot purple lightning into the air, decimating a corpse.

The decapetated head of Granny Wen was held into the air. A-Yuan was nowhere to be found.

'It was all of you against just me! That's not fair!'

(It was a war; this was battle. It was not meant to be fair.)

They had invited Wei Wuxian to Jin Ling's 100-day ceremony and ambushed him on the way.

(Not all of them were involved in that.)

They had all promised peace if Wen Qing and Wen Ning surrendered themselves. They all knew the two had. Even if there had been lies mixed in, no one would believe the two had surrendered themselves for no reason. They had to have known of the promise that was made.

They had shown up to the Nightless City regardless.

(Liars and crooks. But they were the gentry, so no one bat an eye.)

'It was all of you against just me! That's not fair!'

In this moment, Jiang Cheng curled in on himself. He sat with his knees up and buried his head in them, wrapping his arms around his body to block out any additional light that might enter.

Once, he had found Wei Wuxian's relationship with Lan Wangji disgusting. Beyond his own relationship with Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun's initially forceful methods, everything about their interactions had felt off in a way Jiang Cheng couldn't describe. Jin Ling had felt the same way at first, though changed his mind as the simulation went on.

It was just strange seeing two men behave the way they had.

(Wei Wuxian being literally dragged to the Cloud Recesses hadn't helped matters.)

And yet-

When Zewu-jun shook his head, they had seen the last bit of hope Lan Wangji had crumble before their eyes. The prideful Jade of Lan shook his head in denial, trying to stand and leave as though the wounds on his back couldn't even be felt. The sheer devastation in his screams had been haunting.

And, in contrast, Jiang Cheng had-

The little boy playing Sandu Shengshou raised a brow, firing back, 'Why can't I be better than you? Don't you remember how you died?'

Corpses tore Wei Wuxian's flesh from his bones. As they continued to eat, purple lightning continued flashing to the side.

"Disgusting."

In a voice too quiet to be heard, Jiang Cheng whispered a single word to himself.

"Disgusting. Disgusting. Disgusting."

With his body curled up as it was, even those who could hear him could never hope to identify the word. Nonetheless, Jiang Cheng continued.

"Disgusting. Disgusting. Disgusting. Disgusting. Disgusting-"

This time, he saw neither the Yiling Patriarch nor Hanguang-jun in his mind's eye.

The only person he could picture at his point in time was his future-self, leading the Jiang Sect against Wei Wuxian.

(Powerful. Dangerous. Respected. Everything he had longed to be.)

"Disgusting."

He was nearly choking the words out now, feeling bile rise in his throat.

It was-

"A-Cheng, A-Li. Everyone. How have you… all been doing?" Jiang Fengmian's voice asked.

Jiang Cheng couldn't look.

He couldn't breathe.

"Hi, everyone!" Wei Wuxian called out cheerfully. "Anything interesting happen since we last spoke?"

Not a single person present seemed to have any blood left in their face at all. Unable to stop himself, Jiang Cheng ended up dropping his gaze to see Lan Wangji.

The look of sheer devastation the Lan now showed said far more than any words could ever hope to.

'Oh, boy,' Wei Wuxian thought, giving a mental sigh as the silence stretched on. 'What's got them stunned silent this time?'

Really, the main clans could be so difficult to deal with sometimes. It was like they were hearing a ghost!

Chapter End Notes

In hindsight, I ended up wishing I'd stuck closer to the novel dialogue for the original bar/tavern gossipers scene (I copied the donghua's instead). This seemed like a reasonable place to slip that part back in!
